Is the Editor of this Newspaper foolish enough to suppose, that because Ministers knew such and such fleets to be sailing toward such and such points, and could form by that means some idea of the relative position of those fleets, therefore they must know precisely where the naval forces were? Does he think that a vessel is to arrive every day from each fleet, giving an account of the number of leagues that fleet may have sailed, and of the exact latitude in which that fleet still is? Does he believe, that against adverse winds the news of an engagement must come home at the rate of twenty knots an hour? Does he fancy, that if the engagement have been successful, Ministers must know of it by intuition? or that, if it have been disastrous, they are in a moment to be acquainted with the reason? If he does not really think all this, he is criminal in attempting to raise the discontents of the people by publishing it: and if he does, he must be the silliest man that ever talked politics in an alehouse. We remember to have read in a fairy tale, that a Prince, called the Royal Ram, "was fond of news, and always "had the best;" but we believe that this happy prerogative is confined to the princes in fairy tales, and that the governments of real society can command neither the certain arrival nor the nature of their news. The concluding assertion, then, that in their opinion Ministers knew something unpleasant, or shamefully knew nothing, is too ridiculous to require any further comment. That they knew nothing on this subject could have been matter of no shame; and that they knew something unpleasant has been disproved by the last accounts, which inform us that no battle has been fought.

Having thus exposed the folly and vulgarity of this Paper in its remarks on foreign affairs, or rather its foreign remarks on affairs, we shall perhaps, in some future number, say something of the grossness pervading those of its columns which relate to domestic matter.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH, DUTCH, GERMAN, AND HAMBURGH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, MARCH 21.—By a Decree of the 17th of this month, his Majesty has ordered the execution of the measures determined on at Paris in December last respecting the Jews. A Synagogue and Israelite Consistory is to be established for every 2000 Jews, but there can be only one Consistorial Synagogue for a Department. The Consistory is to superintend the Rabbies, and see that their teaching be conformable to the doctrines of the Grand Sanhedrin. They are to give information respecting the Jewish Conscripts of their districts. Every Jew who wishes to settle in France or Italy, must give three months previous notice to the nearest Consistory. There is to be a central Consistory at Paris; each Consistory is to have a Grand Rabbi, elected by 25 Notables. The Rabbis of the Central Consistory are to have a salary of 6000 francs; those of the Consistorial Synagogue 7000, and the other Rabbis are not to have less than 1000 francs.

Another Imperial Decree, dated the 17th, annuls all obligations for loans made by Jews to minors, without the sanction of their guardians, to married women without the consent of their husbands, or to military men, without the authority of their superior officers. Bills granted by French subjects to Jews cannot be demanded, unless the holders prove that full value was given without any fraud. All debts accumulated by interest above 5 per cent. are to be reduced by the Courts of Law. If the interest growing on the capital exceed 23 per cent. the contract is to be declared usurious. After the 1st July next, no Jew will be allowed to trade without a patent, renewable annually. This patent the Prefects are not to grant to any individual, until he produces a certificate of his character, testifying that he is no usurer. No Jew not actually domiciliated in the Departments of the Upper and Lower Rhine, can be admitted to a domicile there. In the other Departments the Jews cannot be allowed to settle, except upon the condition of their purchasing rural property, and abandoning commerce. The Emperor may, however, grant to individuals exceptions from this law. The Jews of the Conscription are required to perform personal service, and are not allowed to find substitutes. These regulations are to be continued only during ten years, in the hope that after that period there will be no difference between the moral character of the Jews and other Citizens of the Empire. If the contrary should appear, the law will be continued in force.

The Jews of Bourdeaux, of the Gironde, and the Landes, having given no cause for complaint, are not made subject to the above regulations.

MARCH 23.—The Official Journal of this day contains the Declaration of Russia and of Denmark against Sweden; and also the Proclamation issued by General Buxhoeden, on his entrance into Finland. This last is preceded by an article from Stockholm, in which an account is thus communicated of the imprisonment of M. Alopeus, the Russian Envoy.

It was on the 5th instant that we had the pain to witness the Russian Minister, M. Alopeus, taken into custody. The following is an account of the manner in which that strange event took place:—That day, at two o'clock in the morning, Baron de Rove, the King's Aid-de-Camp, was announced to M. Alopeus, and made known to that Minister that he had received orders to arrest him, and to seal up his papers, and those of his mission. As was natural, the Minister protested against this treatment, and wished to oppose it, when some officers, with a numerous detachment of the body guards, made their appearance, and obliged him to submit. All persons employed under the Russian Embassy were roused from their beds, and those in the city were searched out, and a guard set over their residence. A Lieutenant of the body guards was made responsible for the person of the Minister, and four subaltern officers were ordered to guard those employed by him, sentinels being placed at the door of the house. Madame Alopeus was offered the choice, either of leaving her house, and going to live elsewhere in the city, or of submitting and remaining with those who are confined.

The following is the Note which, under these circumstances, M. d'Ehrenstein, the Swedish Minister for Foreign Affairs, transmitted to M. Alopeus:—

"The King has just received information that a Russian army has entered Finland, and has approached Louisa. This accomplished abroad bears upon it all the characters of perfidy; on which account his Majesty has given orders to the undersigned to declare to M. Alopeus, Minister of Russia at the Court of Sweden, that the King considers all his diplomatic functions as wholly at an end.

(Signed) EHRENSTEIN."

On this Note the Moniteur makes a long and most vehement comment, in which it is called an outrageous violation of the rights of Ambassadors, and to be equalled in barbarism only by the acts of the Dey of Algiers.

In the same Number of the Official Journal, there is an article from Copenhagen of the 14th instant, containing the following information:—

"The Russian Minister, M. Alopeus, who was arrested at Stockholm, has nevertheless found means to transmit hither a letter, which was immediately forwarded to Petersburgh. The King of Sweden, who has long spurned every thing that was becoming, has given a severe shock to the Diplomatic Body. He has done still more; he has caused a Russian Courier, sent from Petersburgh to M. Alopeus, to be plundered at Abo, and has robbed him of his dispatches. Because every one murmured at Stockholm, he has retired to Grypsholm. Our Court has declared war against Sweden, and letters of marque are issued against Swedish ships. It has been lately ascertained, that no preparations for defence are going forward in Sweden. A traveller, who lately came from Stockholm, saw no kind of troops in motion. The coast is as defenceless as Finland was; indeed it is impossible not to lament the fate of the interesting Swedish nation; her fate resembles that of Portugal, which country England came to help, and deprived her of Madeira. Now men see all the blessings of the revolution of 1778, and that it has been the spring of all the distresses of Sweden. In the course of this winter nothing of importance has occurred at Boulogne, Dunkirk, or Ostend: the works along the coast and in the harbours have been damaged by the inundations, but workmen are busy in restoring them, and soon no traces of the damage will be visible.—The fitting out of privateers still goes on in the ports, and with so much the more zeal, since the profits which the owners derive from them have become more considerable. The mercantile interest of Paris even takes a share in these speculations, a circumstance which has seldom happened before. Letters from Nantes, Bourdeaux, and other ports on the Ocean, also speak of the gainful state of privatering along the coasts. Already various mercantile houses in Belgium place out a part of their capital in this species of enterprize."

PARIS, MARCH 26.—Letters from Rome state, that the troops of his Holiness are incorporated with the French army. They are, however, allowed to wear the Papal Cockade, Cardinal Caracciolo, Pignatelli, Salazzo, and the two Ruffos, who are Neapolitans by birth, and also all the other Prelates, have left Rome.

SPAIN.

INSURRECTION AND DISGRACE OF THE PRINCE OF PEACE.

MADRID, MARCH 19, 1808.—Nine o'Clock at Night.—Since Sunday the 18th instant, such important events have taken place, that the hurry in which I write will not allow me to arrange them in a proper order. Certain intelligence having been received of the Emperor of France coming here, it was asked on the part of the King, and at the request of the Admiral (the Prince of Peace), what was the object of his journey, and whither his troops were directed to march?—The answer was, that he came in a peaceable manner, for the good of the nation, and to make a Prince happy. The King, with his natural simplicity, and with great satisfaction, shewed this letter to the Admiral, who, being immediately aware of the blow which threatened him, proposed to make arrangements to escape to Mexico, taking with him the King, whom he succeeded in persuading to follow him, apprizing him with what they had to fear from the arrival of the Emperor and his troops; and for this purpose the Admiral took out of the Royal Chest, 36 millions of rials. In the course of last month, he had sent already sixty millions to Coruna, which were destined for London, where he has forty millions of dollars. On Wednesday, he arrived in Madrid, and withdrew on Sunday, in the evening, according to his usual custom, to Aranjuez. As soon as he arrived there, he called a meeting of the Council, in which the flight of their Majesties were discussed. The following day (Monday), early in the morning, the signatures of the three principal persons were collected; and when Cavallero's turn came, he said that he did not chuse to sign, nor should he allow them to do what they intended. The King represented to him in the most earnest manner the danger in which they found themselves; the general discontent of the people of Madrid, demanded his head, (as the Admiral had falsely made him believe.) Cavellero said that there was no such thing, that all was false, and that he had been deceived.—The King immediately answered—Do they deceive me? Do they betray me? Who is the Traitor?—That is the Gentleman, pointing to the Admiral, who drew his sword.—The Council immediately broke up. The principal party, consisting of Cavellero, the Prince, Altemire, Fernando Nunes, who, they say, was wounded, as were most of the Grandees. This happened at night: at the noise the Life-Guards entered, and among them the Halbert-bearers, and soon afterwards the mob. The project, which was for some time only suspected, was ascertained by the orders given to the Life Guards. On the following day (Monday) in the morning, the Life Guards took post on the Rond of Ocanna. The Hall of the Council and the whole of the Palace presented a scene of popular tumult. Some of the Guards cried out "Kill him," others "Seize him!" and some pointed the sword to his breast. The Prince of Asturias clung to the Admiral, who placing himself between the troops with fixed bayonets, fled to his house, or concealed himself in the Palace, and the Queen to her apartment. On Wednesday, in the evening, a mail arrived, with an order, for the garrison of Madrid to assemble and prepare to march. At seven o'clock at night the bearers of these orders went to all the coffee-houses, and wherever they found officers or guards, directed them to join their corps, and through the whole town the carriages and horses were put into requisition. The troops remained all day in their quarters, which none of them were on any account permitted to leave, and much fermentation was observed among the people. And it was a matter of joy to them to go to the house of the Admiral, to see that he had no longer a guard of hussars. The Council of Castille met the same day, and continued in deliberation from ten in the morning until four in the afternoon, to answer the two questions of the King, whether he should leave the country, and whether his people were disturbed; to which questions the reply was, that he ought not to leave the country, nor would they allow him to do so. That the people were quiet and loved him, as he might himself see, if he would come to Madrid. This and the whole of the preceding day, nothing but complaints, clamours, and farewells, were heard in Aranjuez, because the King entertained the project of departing, until two in the afternoon, when a courier arrived from Napoleon, assuring him that he came with pacific intentions. This intelligence was immediately promulgated, and the lamentations were converted into shouts of joy, congratulations, and embraces throughout all Aranjuez. The Patriarch returned home full of joy, exclaiming, "nothing is the matter, every "thing is settled, go and make it public, let every one know." At half past eleven o'clock the same day, five loaded waggons passed through Aranjuez. Silva and Don Vicente arrived and brought the news, and a courier dispatched by Cavallero brought it to Government, with a charge to proclaim as soon as it should reach Delicias, "All is settled, I am the bearer of good news, "and of the orders for the troops to depart."

At midnight all the King's Guards, the Admiral's Hussars, the Volunteers of the State, and the Cavalry with loaded carbines and pistols, and the Artillery with lighted matches were on duty. Yesterday (Thursday) in the morning, the annexed edict was posted, intended to undeceive and tranquilize the people; but at the same time, it was well known, that the Admiral was neither apprehended nor disgraced, as had been reported. On the contrary, on the Tuesday the Royal Family breakfasted at his house, and on the following day he was at the Palace, which grieved every body, and the inhabitants of Aranjuez continued much disturbed. Last night, the Admiral withdrew from the Palace at eleven o'clock, and at one attempted to escape. The Life Guards observed it, approached, and having ascertained the fact, fired a pistol, at which signal the rest of the guards assembled, and a throng of people endeavoured to force through the Admiral's hussars who surrounded his house. Some of the Life Guards were killed, and Don Diego Godoy (the Admiral's brother), who was at the head of his regiment of Spanish guards, ordered them to fire, but none obeyed. He repeated the order, when the people, and even his own soldiers, fell on him, fired at him, beat him, and tied his hands and feet. The disturbance became general, from a belief that the Royal Family (who were in bed) intended to escape. Forty Life Guards set off at full speed after the Admiral, who had fled, and they succeeded in overtaking him, when they found him, and took him to the Palace at two o'clock; they came up with him at Ocanna. The Princess of Peace and her daughter they carried to alight put them in a coach drawn by the peasantry, who conducted them to the Palace, and delivered them to the Prince, who came out to receive them with two candles in his hands.

This day, at eight o'clock in the morning, our Royal Family appeared in the balcony of the Palace, to thank the people. At twelve, two Decrees were posted up in Madrid, one of which addressed to the President of the Council, is in substance as follows:—

"The King, in order to undeceive your Lordship and the Council, and that the public may be correctly informed of what occurred last night, makes known, that in consequence of a disturbance between some Hussars and Life Guards, some military and peasants assembled, induced by an erroneous belief that their Majesties intended to leave the country, but their Majesties neither think of leaving their country, nor have they ever thought for a moment of withdrawing themselves from the bosom of their beloved subjects; that at five o'clock in the morning every thing was quiet in the Palace, and he directs the President to make it known, in order that the Public may banish from their minds all false reports," &c. &c.

The second Decree recommends the Public to hold good harmony and peace with the French troops, who are to pass through the capital and its environs, on their march to Cadiz.

This evening, the annexed Manuscript Decree was published, which levelled the Grand Colossus; such is the general joy and satisfaction of the public, that I doubt whether a general peace would cause a greater; and we all publicly congratulate each other. The public look upon the French without fear, without dread, and as their deliverers. The Privates will be received at their quarters, and the Officers at the mansions and dwellings of the great. Order is recommended.

To-morrow, about 4,000 will enter the city—the following day, the Imperial Guard—and on Monday Prince Murat. General report says, that the Emperor is detained by these occurrences, because letters from Bayonne and Yrun say, that he arrived there on the 12th, and others contradict it. La Mancha is in a state of much confusion, and the people are determined to prevent the departure of the Royal Family; the intelligence of which had reached that Province.

DECREES.

"Aranjuez, March 18, 1808.

"As I intend to command my army and navy in person, I have thought proper to release Don Manuel Godoy, Prince of the Peace, from the employs of Generalissimo and Admiral, and give him leave to withdraw whither he pleases. You are herewith informed of it, and will communicate it to whom it concerns."

"To Don Francis Gill."

MADRID GAZETTE, FRIDAY, MARCH 18, 1808.

His Majesty has been pleased to transmit the following Decree to his Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, First Secretary of State

"My beloved Subjects! Your generous agitation in these circumstances is a fresh proof of the sentiments of your hearts, and I, who love you as a tender father, take the earliest opportunity to console with you in the distressed situation in which we are placed. Be tranquil; know that the army of my dear Ally, the Emperor of the French, traverses my kingdom with ideas of friendship and peace. Its object is to march to the points which are threatened with the danger of a descent by the enemy, and the junction of my life-guards has no other object than to protect my person, and they are not intended to accompany me on a voyage, which malice endeavoured to represent as necessary. Surrounded by the unshaken loyalty of my armed subjects, of which I have received such unquestionable proofs, what have I to fear? and should any imperious necessity require it, could I doubt of the assistance which their generous bosoms offered me? But no such necessity will ever be witnessed by my people.—Spaniards, allay your fears; conduct yourselves as you have hitherto done towards the troops of the Ally of your good King. In a few days you will see peace and tranquillity restored; your hearts and mine enjoying the happiness which God bestows on me in the bosom of my family and your love. Given in my Royal Palace of Aranjuez, the 16th March, 1808.

"By the King, A. D. PEDRO CEVALLOS."

GERMANY.

VIENNA, MARCH 14.—Our army has undergone an entire new organization, and a strong cordon is formed on the frontiers of Turkey. Letters from Constantinople state that the Turkish Military preparations are very great, and that the Grand Seignor is to head the army himself. Notwithstanding this intelligence several Austrian regiments which were on their march towards the frontiers, have received orders to halt. The celebrated Servian General Czerni George has arrived here.

LOWER SAXONY.

HAMBURGH, MARCH 14.—We are assured that the French Government has made a demand upon the three Hanse towns (Hamburgh, Bremen, and Lubec) for a certain number of seamen, some say 8000, which are to be sent to Flushing and Boulonge.

DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN, MARCH 15.—Every thing is prepared for the embarkation and passage of the allied army to Scania. It is hoped that we shall for that purpose be able to profit of the first moment that a complete thaw takes place. There are already assembled at Elsineur a sufficient number of armed vessels for protecting this operation against the Swedish flotilla; but besides this flotilla, as we understand from the information we have received, will not be ready before six months. In order to give greater energy to the military operations, the Danish army is about to be new organized upon a plan entirely conformable to that of France. The flotilla which is now constructing will be joined to the army, and will follow all its movements. A naval officer will be attached to each division of the army.

MARCH 16.—The Prince of Ponte Corvo having crossed the Great Belt in less than six hours, arrived here at the very moment we received intelligence of the death of Christian VII. A Decree has been published here, containing very strict regulations with respect to the Swedes domiciliated in Denmark. All correspondence with Sweden is prohibited, and the ships and merchandize belonging to that country are confiscated. According to the most recent intelligence from Stockholm, the Russians had obtained possession of Abo; and it is confirmed that the Swedes have burnt the flotilla which was stationed there. On the 4th, the Swedish head-quarters were still at Favastus, where General Klingsporr had arrived. General Armfelt had set out for his destination. King Gustavus was still at Gripsholm, but was about to proceed to Carlscrona. At the date of this intelligence, M. Alopeus was still under arrest, and his Swedish Majesty had also ordered a Russian courier, arrived at Stockholm from Petersburgh, to be arrested.

DUTCH BUDGET.

UTRECHT, MARCH 30.—A Committee of the Council of State, consisting of M. M. Van Leyden, Van Westharendrecht Cuypus, and Heinlopen, brought, on the 9th instant, to the Legislative Body, the following Message, relating to the Finances, and in the sitting of yesterday the project of a Decree, proposed in the Message, was adopted.

THE KING TO THE LEGISLATIVE BODY.

"GENTLEMEN,

"We have charged a Committee of our Council of State to present to you a project of a law relative to the Finances of this year. At the commencement of your present Session we expressed on our part a strong desire to adopt a definitive and permanent system with respect to the Finances, but since the 26th of November affairs have not been ameliorated, and we have been under the indispensible necessity of provisarily shutting our ports. This extreme and painful measure ought to ensure to us compensation, to which we have so much title, and affords an irrefragable proof of the sincerity and constancy of our efforts in the common cause. Thus we must postpone all idea of a definitive and permanent system until a maritime peace, when alone it will be possible to reduce our expenditure to the amount of our revenue."

It then goes on to state, that the expenditure for 1807 had been 78,000,009 florins, and the revenues only 55,000,000, leaving a deficit of 23,000,000, exclusive of previous arrears. To meet these a loan of 40,000,000 had been negotiated, which produced 38,000,000; the 15,000,000, after providing for the deficit, was applied to the payment of arrears. The estimate of expenditure for 1808 is 71,000,000, whilst the revenue is not estimated to produce more than 50,000,000.

It is said in this part of the Message, "We cannot dispense with maintaining in a good state the squadrons of the Texel and the Meuse. We announce with pleasure to the Legislative Body, that as the price of our efforts France has expressly engaged to procure the restoration of our colonies, and particularly those of Guiana."

Digitized by Google

To meet the deficit of the present year a sort of forced assessment is proposed, which was adopted by the Legislative Body, by which those paying it are to become creditors of the state to the amount required. This is resorted to instead of a loan.

ITALY.

MILAN, MARCH 17.—Mr. Adair, the late English Ambassador at Vienna, arrived at Trieste, on the 8th instant. Two English frigates were expected in that port, destined to convey to Malta the Ambassador and the other English in the Austrian States. An English squadron of 13 sail continued to cruize in the Adriatic, and prevented vessels from either going out or coming into Trieste. It was feared that the English would seize the first favourable opportunity of attacking the five Russian ships of the line and frigates which were in that port.

According to the last intelligence from Dalmatia, the English have occupied the Isle of Levina, on the coast of that province, in order to obtain, as is supposed, the more easily, water and provisions, and also a shelter in bad weather.

FROM THE MALTA AND GIBRALTAR MAILS.

GIBRALTAR, MARCH 18.—General Spencer's expedition arrived here on the 8th of March; the British troops have landed, and the German part, with Meuron's and Watteville's regiments, which were in garrison here, have embarked, and will sail for Sicily or Malta in a few days. It is supposed that General Spencer will wait here for fresh instructions from England, and for the return of the British part of the expedition, which sailed some time since for Sicily.

MARCH 26.—The provinces of Catalonia, Navarre, and Biscay, no longer belong to the Spanish Monarchy. They are taken possession of by the French troops; and the Grand Duke of Berg has published a Proclamation, stating that this measure is taken for pacific purposes. This Proclamation has occasioned a fall in the Value, from 63 to 60. The number of French troops which have entered Spain exceeds 150,000 men. A French force is daily expected at Malaga. Considerable gloom prevails throughout Spain.

MARCH 27.—The news of Bonaparte's arrival at Madrid is not confirmed. Must is there by this time. The Carthagena squadron continued at Port Mahon by the latest accounts. The Toulon and Rochefort squadrons are out. The light company of the 40th, with a small detachment of artillery and two Officers of Engineers, are going to take possession of a small uninhabited rock under Apa's Hill, called the Parsley Island, in Spanish, whence our cruizers (that is, gun-boats and small craft) will be better able to intercept the supplies or reinforcements daily going from Tarifa to Ceuta. Sir Sidney Smith, in his Majesty's ships Foudroyant, of 80 guns, with the Agamemnon, of 64 guns, sailed from this place on the 13th inst. supposed for the Brazils.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, APRIL 11.

LORD MOIRA presented a petition from certain Insolvent Debtors, which was ordered to lie on the table.

LORD GRENVILLE presented a petition from a large body of Irish Catholics, for the repeal of the various disqualifying statutes to which they are still subject. His Lordship stated, that there was some informality in the mode of annexing several of the names to the petition. Many thousands of them were the actual signatures of the persons petitioning, but others, undoubtedly from ignorance of the forms necessary to be observed in such matters, purported to have been subscribed by the authority of the individuals whose names were subjoined. The result of his enquiry into the usage of the House on similar occasions, was, that the petition might be received, as that of the persons whose names were regularly subscribed, without paying any attention to the other signatures. Under this impression, therefore, he should move that it lie upon the table; intending, should this proposition be acceded to, to follow it up by another, for taking the petition into consideration on the 12th of May.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR had no objection to the petition lying on the table; but wished this to be considered in the present, and in every case where an informality occurred in petitions, as resulting from their Lordships indulgence, rather than any rule of proceeding generally binding upon the House.

The Petition was then ordered to lie on the table, and their Lordships were ordered to be summoned for the 13th, instead of the 12th of May, previously mentioned.

The Orders in Council Indemnity Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, APRIL 12.

The Innkeeper's Subsistence Bill was read a third time and passed.

INDICTMENT BILL.

EARL STANHOPE called the attention of the House to this Bill, which he said purported to be a Bill to amend the law, but which, in his opinion, tended to make it worse. He thought that part of the Bill in particular which related to proceedings on informations, highly objectionable. His Lordship said, he did not mean to debate the Bill now; his object was, that a duty should be fixed for the second reading, and that it should be fully discussed. He therefore moved, that the Bill be read a second time on the 16th of May, and that the Lords be summoned.

LORD HOLLAND said he had to state objections to the Bill, under a different point of view from that taken by his Noble Friend. The motion was then agreed to.

The Duke of Cumberland presented a Petition from the Mayor and Corporation of Dublin, hostile to the claims of the Irish Catholics.

The Irish Wool Export Bill, and Reversion Suspension Bill, were received from the Commons, and read a first time.

LORD MOIRA repeated, with respect to the latter, the observations he had lately made on the Reversion Prohibition Bill. He thought a conference should be held with the Commons, to ascertain in what manner they connected the subject with substantial purposes of reform. If the system was the thing objected to, then the best way would be to purchase up the reversionary rights, and to prohibit the practice in future; by which proceeding the Crown and the Public might both be benefited, the former by diminishing the existing number of grantees, and placing the offices at its disposal as they became vacant; the latter by the abolition of such of the offices as were no longer judged fit to be continued. But the effect of the course now pursued would, he apprehended, be to diminish the influence of the Crown, without any advantage to the people. It was on this ground solely, and not from any abstract notions of its being improper, under any circumstances, to trench upon the prerogative, that he wished, before giving his assent to the measure, to have some further explanation of the motives which led to its adoption by the other House.

On the suggestion of Lord Grosvenor, the second reading of the Bill was fixed for the 9th of May.

Lord Darnley moved for an Account of the Offices granted in Reversion in Ireland.—The motion was agreed to, with the addition of the words—"Great Britain and" before "Ireland" an Amendment suggested by Lord Lauderdale.

The Irish Orders in Council Bill went through a Committee.

The Scotch Judicature Bill also went through a Committee. Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13.

Counsel were further heard in the Roxburgh appeal.

The Scotch Judicature Bill was reported, and ordered to be printed.

The Irish Orders in Council Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Irish Wool Export Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, APRIL 14.

At three o'clock their Lordships met, when the following Bills received the Royal Assent by Commission:

The Exchequer Bills Funding Bill, the Cotton Wool Duty Bill, the Irish Duties Bill, the Cotton Wool Exportation Prohibition Bill, the Malt Duty Bill, the Irish Bank Token Bill, the Annual Indemnity Bill, the Irish East India Trade Bill, the Irish Warehousing Bill, the Jesuits' Bark Exportation Prohibition Bill, the Irish Bark and Wool Exportation Prohibition Bill, the Orders in Council Indemnity Bill, the Innkeepers' Rate of Subsistance Bill, the Croydon Canal Bill, Lord Grenville's Estates Bill, Lord Cassilis' Estate Bill, a Naturalization Bill, 12 Inclosure, and several Road Bills, making in all 47.

Mr. Wharton, and a Deputation from the Commons, brought up the Irish Promissory Note Bill, and the Irish Customs Fees Abolition Bill, which were severally read a first time.

The Irish Wool Exportation Prohibition Bill went through a Committee, and was reported.

After some further routine business, when several Bills of a local and private nature were forwarded through their various stages, the House adjourned until this day fortnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, APRIL 11.

Sir W. Curtis gave notice that on the 27th instant he should move for leave to bring in a Bill rendering child-stealing an indictable offence.

Mr. Calcraft gave a notice for the 3d of May, on the Papers produced respecting the sailing of the Rochefort squadron.

Sir C. Pole, in a speech of some length on the subject of the Royal Naval Asylum, stated various abuses which had crept into the appointment of officers, and moved a resolution, that it was the opinion of the House that fit and qualified persons only, such as had served in the Royal Navy, or in the Marines, should be appointed to offices in that asylum.

The motion was resisted by Mr. Rose, who moved the previous question. After a debate of some length the House divided, when Mr. Rose's amendment was carried—Ayes 71.—Noes 46.

BUDGET.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer submitted to the Committee the annual statement of the finances of the Country, with the exception of the terms of the loan, which is not yet contracted for.—Having stated the comparative amount of the Supplies, and Ways and Means for the year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proceeded to state the Additional Annual Charge created.

The interest wanted for the loan of eight millions, and for four millions of Exchequer Bills, would amount to something about £.750,000.

To cover which, there was Short Annuities fallen in	£.380,000
Annual Saving on the management of the Public Debt	65,000
Increase upon the Assessed Taxes....	125,000
And in order to make up the deficiency which still remained, he should propose certain modifications and additions to the existing Stamp Duties, which he calculated would produce.....	200,000

Total amount of annual charge	Total amount of provision made for meeting the annual charge
£.750,000	£. 770,000

Mr. Perceval proceeded to state the outline of the arrangements which he meant to introduce into the collection of the Stamp Duties, from which he expected that the public were to derive an annual advantage of 200,000*l.* At present the Stamp Duties were collected under the provisions of from sixty to seventy different Acts of Parliament. These Acts he meant to digest so as that they might be all reduced to one general Act. He proposed that a duty of 20*l.* should be attached only upon admissions to officers of the yearly value of 300*l.* and upwards; and that persons should pay only 2*l.* on being admitted to offices of inferior value. Indentures and articles of clerkship to attornies practising in the higher Courts he proposed that a duty of only 110*l.* be paid; on indentures and articles of clerkship to attornies practising in the inferior Courts that a duty of only 55*l.* shall be paid: and also that the last mentioned duty shall be paid by apprentices to writers to the Signet in Scotland. On collations and donations he should propose to lay an additional tax of 2*l.* and it was his intention also that infefuments, which at present paid a duty of 1*l.* 10*s.* shall be subjected to a duty of 3*l.* He hoped, also, that the Committee would see no objection to subjecting grants of honours and dignities to the same scale of taxation which they now paid in Ireland. He would also propose to repeal the duties in all cases where the leases on Crown lands were chargeable with a duty of 20*l.* where those were not considered as beneficial. It was also his intention to diminish the tax on small pensions, and increasing [illegible] for those which were to a considerable amount in point of [illegible]. Policies of Insurances on Lives he thought ought to be [illegible] as Promissory Notes re-issuable by people [illegible] banks in the country; with this view he proposed [illegible] issuing promissory notes shall be obliged to take [illegible] which they shall pay 20*l.* a year, and that all promissory notes re-issuable, and which at present paid a stamp duty of 3*d.* should pay a duty of 4*d.* and that when they were only payable in the place where they were issued, they should pay a duty of 6*d.* He should also propose that transfers of shares in joint stock companies should be paid in future upon its real value at the time of the transfer, instead of its nominal value. He should likewise propose, that a duty of one shilling should be imposed upon all summonses before Masters in Chancery. The existing taxes upon legacies, he meant to remove by the introduction of a new regulation for putting the residuary legatee on precisely the same footing with the others. Conveyances of land which at present pay a duty of thirty shillings, whatever may be the value of the land, were also fit matter for arrangement. He proposed, that when the conveyance did not exceed the value of 150*l.* it should only pay a duty of 1*l.*; that when it was of the value of from 150*l.* to 300*l.* it should pay 1*l.* 10*s.*; when it was of the value of from 3 to 500*l.* that it should pay 2*l.* 10*s.*; that when it rose to the value of 1000*l.* it should pay 7*l.* 10*s.* and so on, carrying the tax in no instance more than 1 per cent. upon the consideration. The Chancellor of the Exchequer concluded with observing, that he had brought forward his financial statement to give Gentlemen full time to peruse the schedule which had been prepared, and to form a judgment of its merits before they were called upon to give it the sanction of their approbation.

Mr. Bidduph contended that there was no necessity whatever for the Right Hon. Gentlemen to have imposed any new taxes upon the people for the service of the ensuing year.

After a few observations from Mr. Tierney, Mr. Davis Giddy and Mr. Vansittart,

Mr. Huskisson moved that the sum of 725,000*l.* be issued from the surplus of the Consolidated Fund for the service of the year 1809, which Resolution being agreed to, the House was resumed, and the Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

On the third reading of the Revision Bill Mr. Whitbread stated his objection to the Bill, and deprecated the eminence of his Majesty's Ministers in throwing the last Bill out of the House of Lords.

Mr. Perceval denied the assertion.

The Speaker then put the question, that the Bill be read a third time, when Lord Porchester rose, and with a considerable degree of animated argument, proposed an amendment, which went to alter the preamble of the Bill, and make it more agreeable to the feelings of the public.

Sir F. Burdett animadverted with considerable severity on the secret party which existed hostile to Ministers and to the House. He said, we had Kings dethroned, and States annihilated, by armies of mercenaries. We ought to be a people united together, confiding in the present Ministry, but not in the present Government; and that was all this great Nation required. He did not think the Bill went far enough, and not going the proper length, he should oppose it entirely.

The House divided, For the original motion 132; for the Amendment, 60—Majority 88. The Bill was then read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, APRIL 12.

Mr. Alderman Shaw presented a Petition from the Debtors in the Fleet Prison, praying relief.—Laid on the table.

ROMAN CATHOLICS.

Mr. Grattan presented a Petition from the Roman Catholics of Ireland, praying relief from the disabilities they now endure, and that they may be restored to the free participation of the rights and privileges of British subjects. It was, however, his duty to state, that the Petition was signed by a great number of persons, and that there were a variety of names affixed to it, not written by the persons whose names they purported to be, but written by others, under their authority. He should therefore move that the Petition be received as the Petition of those individuals who had actually subscribed it.

The Speaker said, that the rule was clear, that a Petition so signed could not be received. The names of those so put down might, however, be detached, and then the Petition, being less objectionable, might be received.

Some conversation then arose, which terminated in Mr. Grattan withdrawing the Petition, giving notice that he should present it again on the 16th of May, in a less objectionable form, and on that day he should move that it be taken into consideration.

DEFENCE OF THE COUNTRY.

Lord Castlereagh rose, pursuant to notice, to state his new Militia Plan, for the Internal Defence of the Country. He commenced a most eloquent harangue, and said, it was merely on voluntary service, to deny Government the means of making the most adequate provision possible against a case of emergency, would not be placing our defence on those safe and permanent principles, which the state of the times imperiously demanded. Whatever confidence Parliament placed in the Volunteers, it was its duty not to trust altogether to voluntary zeal, but to provide against every chance by a fixed and permanent force.—He deprecated the Training Act, and said that the provisions of the act could not be carried into execution, so far as respected the training of 200,000 within the year, and the employing of parish officers as drill serjeants, a purpose for which he thought them totally unfit. It was necessary that the country should have a regimented force upon which it could depend; and looking at the force already existing, the regulars and the militia, it was incumbent on Parliament to determine what further regimented force it was proper to keep up, and what ought to be substituted for the deficiencies in the Volunteers. It was the opinion of experienced military men, that if we had a regular subsidiary force amounting to six times the number of the Militia, this number, combined with the Regular Force already existing, and the powers under the Training Bill, would be sufficient as a permanent and established system. Upon the principle of six times the Militia, there would be 330,000 provided for Great Britain only, which, with the addition of the 70,000 Regulars in Ireland, would make up for the United Kingdom 400,000, independent of the 50,000 that might be called out under the Training Bill. His Lordship said, that the object of his Bill was to assimilate the mode as nearly as possible to that by which the Regular Militia was raised, with this fundamental difference, however, between the two bodies, that whereas the Regular Militia in time of war was kept on duty like troops of the line, the force he proposed to raise would not be marched from their counties, but only called out there for training, in the same manner as the Regular Militia was in time of peace. As to the terms of service for which they ought to be called, he thought a few days in one year totally inadequate for the purposes of training the men. A certain portion of each year for four years would better answer the convenience of the country, as well as that of individuals. This service was certainly no serious burthen—it was nothing more than that it should not be open to the men to withdraw at any moment, but that they should engage for a fixed time. If this had been originally proposed to the Volunteers, he had no doubt they would have acceded to it. People might say, that their trades and private affairs required their presence at home, but unless the country was secured, they might find their domestic cares of little avail. In the Regular Militia, substitution was properly and necessarily allowed, because, when called out during war, which might last for several years, they were obliged to turn their backs on their other avocations. In this force, the men were only to be called out for a few days in each year, and if substitution was to be allowed, it would operate as a grievous tax upon the country. He would propose, that no substitution should be allowed in this force; although he would not go to such an extreme as to say, that no mode should be left open for withdrawing personal service. A fine should be the only mode of exemption; but that fine ought to be such as would secure the personal service in some capacity or other, even of the higher orders, unless they had some very serious obstacle to encounter. Another mitigation might be allowed, and that was, that persons might be permitted to volunteer into this local Militia; care being taken that these should not be substitutes for individuals. With this view, it would be made penal for the parish to take any volunteer as a substitute for any individual, and for any individual who accepted of such substitute. To encourage volunteering into this force, under the regulations above mentioned, a small bounty might be allowed. If the whole 400,000 men were to be balloted for at once, it would be no difficult matter to ascertain the proper periods. He thought the best mode would be to throw out the persons of more advanced age, at which men did not learn the military exercises so readily, and to fix upon the periods between 18 and 35, applying to such as were not serving in any other capacity, and did not volunteer into this force. It was desirable that the force should as nearly as possible be assimilated to the existing Militia, and that the Officers should be appointed under the same requisites as to property. He would propose, that whoever had held the rank of a Field Officer in the Army, might hold the same rank here, without regard to the qualification in point of property. And there must be a provision that no one should, by his engaging for four years in this service, be precluded from enlisting in the Line, or from entering into the Regular Militia. The only restriction in this point would be, that no one should be allowed to enlist in this manner, till he had been trained during a certain portion of the time prescribed. Another proposition was, that the present Volunteer Corps might, if they chose, transfer themselves, with the approbation of his Majesty, into Local Militia. It would be necessary to correct the abuse of insurance as to the fine: If this was allowed to exist, it would reduce the fine to the premium for the insurance; and therefore there must be a penalty on all insurance, in order to guard against this abuse. As to the expence of the country, it would not be so expensive as the Training Bill, and altogether the expence would not reach farther than 4*l.* a man for the year. Having stated the general outline of the plan, he would move for leave to bring in the Bill to empower his Majesty to raise a Local Militia of 60,000 men. A distant day would be fixed for the second reading. The period of service during the year was to be twenty-eight days, exclusive of the days for assembling, marching, &c. for which, however, pay would be allowed.

Mr. C. Yorke supported the motion.

Mr. Windham ridiculed the plan, and thought that it would lean very hard on individuals whose families would be materially injured by it.

Leave was then given to bring in the Bill to-morrow.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved for leave to bring in a Bill for bettering the condition of Stipendary Curates in England. Permission was granted.

Mr. Creevey moved for certain additional Accounts relative to the King's Droits of Admiralty. Ordered.

The Reports of the Committees of Supply and Ways and Means, were brought up and agreed to. A Bill was ordered on the latter.

A new Writ was ordered for Sandwich, in room of Admiral Rainier, deceased.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13.

Colonel Stanley obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law respecting the Settlement of Paupers, enabling Parish Officers to remove to their own country the natives of Scotland and Ireland, who may be likely to become a burthen to the Parish.

The Vauxhall Bridge Bill was, after a few words from Mr. S. Thornton and Mr. Alderman Combe, read a second time.

Lord Binning presented the Report of the Sugar Committee.

Sir H. Mildmay said, that in this Report the Committee were not unanimous, as it militated in a considerable degree against the landed interest, and he considered it his duty to take an early opportunity to ground some motion on the proceedings of the Committee.

Mr. Hibbert said, it was a measure of necessity that induced the Committee to recommend to this House the propriety of suspending for a time the distillation of grain, but a power was given to his Majesty in Council to do away the suspension when the price of barley was reduced to a certain standard, and therefore the landed interest could not have any ground of complaint, as the interest of both parties was equally balanced in the Report.

The Report was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Foster brought in a Bill to suspend for a time to be limited, the payment of drawbacks on spirits exported to Ireland, which was read a first time.

Lord Castlereagh brought in a Bill to enable his Majesty to raise a "Local Militia," which was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Stipendary Curates Bill was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

A Message was received from the Lords, stating that they had agreed to the Irish Duties and other private bills.

On the motion of Mr. Foster, the report of the Committee of supply of Monday, granting the Irish Estimates, was taken into consideration. After some discussion the Resolutions were agreed to.

In the Committee on the Assessed Taxes Consolidation Bill,

Mr. Lethbridge proposed a clause, laying a duty of 5*s.* 5*s.* on every double-barreled gun used in shooting game. This was objected to by Mr. Huskisson, who said such a proposition ought to originate in a Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. Lethbridge deferred his motion till Tuesday the 20th, when he should move it in a Committee of Ways and Means, with intent to add the resolution to the Bill.

A new writ was ordered, for Yarmouth, in the Isle of Wight, in the room of Mr. Clitherow, who had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

The House then went into a Committee on the Orders in Council, when Mr. R. Dewar was examined in their support. He was asked various questions by Mr. Steven, Mr. Baring,

Mr. Eden, and other Gentlemen, on the subject of the effect of the Berlin Decree, and relative to American ships having carried cargoes from Liverpool to ports on the Continent. His answers were generally corroboratory of such things having taken place.

Mr. Lockhart, Mr. Sheldon, and Mr. Inglis, the East India Director, were next examined on the same subject.—The further hearing of evidence was postponed till next Tuesday week.

Mr. S. Bernard presented the Report of the Committee for Enquiring into the Abuses attending on Lotteries, which was ordered to be laid upon the table.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, APRIL 14.

The Speaker having taken the Chair, a Message from the Lords by the Deputy Black Rod required the attendance of the House in the House of Lords, to hear his Majesty's Commission read for declaring the Royal Assent to certain Bills.

The Speaker, with several Members, went up forthwith, and after some time, returned and acquainted the House that the Royal Assent had been declared to the Exchequer Bills' Funding Bill, the Excise Laws Bill, the Bark Export Prohibition Bill; the Irish Bark and Cotton Export Prohibition Bill, the Irish East India Trade Restriction Bill, the Innkeepers' Military Subsistence Bill, and other Bills.

A new writ was ordered to be issued for the Election of a burgess for St. Mawes, in the room of Scrope Barnard, Esq. who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds; and another for Wareham, in the room of Sir G. T. Culcraft, who has accepted the Stewardship of East Hundred.

Mr. Graham presented a Petition from the South London Water-works Company, against the Bill for erecting a Bridge at Vauxhall.—Referred to the Committee on the Bill.

Mr. Estcourt moved for a Return of the effective strength of each of the Regiments of British Militia on the 1st of July, 1807, and the 1st of April, 1808, distinguishing the number of Volunteers which had entered into the Regulars from each Regiment, and the number necessary to complete each.—Ordered. The House then adjourned until Tuesday sennight.

A new method of curing cattle whose stomachs are swollen from having fed upon wet forage, was some time since announced in the French Journals. It consists in administering to the animal the twentieth part of a pound of gunpowder, mixed in a pint of milk, when first seized with the colic, from eating grass or clover highly charged with dew.

At Taunton assizes considerable interest was excited at the trial of James Richards, a farmer, for the seduction of a young woman to whom he had, for the two preceding years, paid his apparently honourable addresses. The jury returned a verdict of 500l. against the defendant; but as the damages were laid only at 300l. the Judge informed the jury their verdict could not exceed that sum.

Edward Ball, the young man who, at the last Summer Assizes, at Lewes, was capitally convicted of a forgery on the Bank of England, was, on Saturday last, executed at Horsham, pursuant to his sentence, in the presence of some hundreds of spectators. His behaviour, during the six months horrid suspense which he suffered under, before the Judges' opinion of the case was made known to him, and after his condemnation, was every way becoming one in his unhappy situation. At the fatal tree he supported himself with manly fortitude. He said but little, and all that could be distinctly heard was, "that he had sinned, and had repented;" after which, he was launched into eternity, and died without a struggle.

TUESDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

The Gazette contains two dispatches from Major-General Sherbrooke, commanding his Majesty's troops in Sicily. The first, dated the 8th February, states the surrender of Reggio to the French on the 3d, and that four Sicilian gun-boats had fallen into the enemy's possession; and also confirms the loss of the Delight sloop of war, which, in endeavouring to recover the gun boats, got on shore on the Calabrian coast, on the 30th January, and it being found impossible to get her off she was burnt. On this occasion Capt. Handfield, with several of his ship's company, was killed, and Capt. Secombe, of the Glatton, who was on board the Delight, was dangerously wounded, and died on the 3d February.

The second dispatch is dated the 23d February, and incloses the following report from Lieut.-Col. Robertson, the Commandant of Scylla Castle, stating the evacuation of that place.—General S. adds his highest approbation of the conduct of that Officer, and the Officers and Men serving under him in the Castle, and of the Naval Officers and Seamen employed to bring away the garrison.

Messina, Feb. 18, 1808.

SIR—In obedience to your orders, I have the honour to report the particulars of what occurred since the first appearance of the enemy before Scylla.

After being invested by General Regnier's army during seven weeks, and battered for six days by fourteen pieces of heavy ordnance, the little Castle of Scylla has fallen into his hands: but I have the heartfelt satisfaction to add, that not one of the gallant garrison placed under my orders has become his prisoner.

In the latter end of December, the arrival of troops and ordnance stores at Seminara left me no room to doubt the enemy's intention of besieging Scylla, and parties of the peasantry were accordingly sent out to render the passes of Solano impracticable, and to create obstacles to his advance, by cuts across the various paths which lead from the heights of Milia down to Scylla. This work, as well as the levelling of fences, &c. proceeded rapidly and effectually under the direction of Captain Nicholas, Assistant Quarter-Master-General; when, upon the 31st of December, the advanced workmen and the out-posts of the masse were driven in by three French battalions and a detachment of cavalry, under Gen. Millet, which took post upon the heights above us; and on the following day Regnier brought up two more battalions, and spreading his out-posts to Favezzina, Bagnara, &c. completed the investment of the town. At this time the garrison of the Castle consisted of about two hundred British, and from four to five hundred masse occupied the town.

The enemy's troops were now incessantly employed in forming the roads necessary for bringing his heavy ordnance from Seminara, whilst we laboured to render the approach to Scylla difficult, and harrassed the French by constant attacks on his out-posts with parties of the masse, and occasionally with boats. In some of these partial actions the enemy suffered severely; particularly in a night attack at Bagnara, where the Voltigeurs of the 23d Light Infantry were cut to pieces.

Owing to these checks the French were retarded until the 6th of February, when they descended the heights in force, and came within a distant range of our guns; and from this day they honoured our little castle with all the detailed precautions of a regular siege, in covering his approaches and communications. The skirmishes between the enemy and the masse became very serious: the latter displayed great gallantry; and enjoying the support of the Castle guns, obliged the French to purchase their advance with heavy loss; but on the 9th, were obliged to yield to the numbers of the enemy, who assailed the town on all sides: our guns, however, covered their retreat; and I had the satisfaction of sending off these brave peasants to Messina without leaving a man in the enemy's hands.

The force which General Regnier had brought to besiege Scylla, consisted of a body of cavalry, the 23d light infantry, the 1st. 68d and 101st of the line, in all about six thousand men; with five twenty-four-pounders, five eighteens, and four mortars, besides field-pieces.

On the morning of the 11th, he opened his batteries, directing his efforts to the destruction of our upper works, and the disabling of our guns; while under cover of this fire he laboured to establish two breaching batteries, at three and four hundred yards distance. It was not, however, till the 14th, that our parapet and guns were rendered totally useless; nor till then did the slaughter abate to which their parties employed on the breaching batteries were exposed from our grape and shell.

From this time our defence was confined to musketry, as our guns lay buried under the ruins of the parapet, and the close fire from five twenty-four pounders became incessant. In the mean time we discovered him attempting to mine the right bastion, upon which he continued at work for three nights, but I apprehend without the expected success.

In the night of the 15th, the French pushed round the foot of the rock, with the intention of destroying the Sea staircase, but we happily discovered them, and beat them off with the slaughter to which their desperate situation exposed them.

The fire from the breaching batteries had been variously directed till the evening of the 16th, when they bent their undivided fury against the left bastion with such success, that the breach would probably have been practicable by the following evening. It was under these circumstances that I received your orders to evacuate the Castle, and have the great satisfaction of reporting, that we accomplished this yesterday morning, in full view of the enemy, and without leaving an individual behind. The approach of the boats from Faro gave the French full intimation of our design, but the tempestuous state of the weather obliged us to seize the short opportunity of an hour's lull.—Every battery poured its utmost fire upon the Castle, and subsequently upon the boats; while infantry with field-pieces tried the breach on either side

The garrison was drawn off in succession, and the embarkation effected with the greatest order, notwithstanding the tremendous fire of grape, shells, &c. Our loss in the operation was small; and before we were a musket-shot distant, the French were in the fort.

The masterly arrangement of the transport boats and men of war launches upon this occasion, does high honour to Captain Trollope, of his Majesty's ship Electra, who personally superintended this service; and the conduct of the officers and men under him was marked with all the coolness and dexterity of British seamen. I regret to add, that one of them was killed in the operation, and ten wounded, some of them dangerously. The uniform good conduct of the garrison which I have had the good fortune to command, demands my warmest gratitude; and their intrepid spirit during the siege is hardly more commendable than the zeal with which they went through the heavy fatigues that preceded it.

The detachment of the Royal Artillery was highly conspicuous; the excellency of their gunnery was proved by the severe losses which the enemy has sustained; and I cannot too strongly express my sense of the skill and indefatigable zeal which Lieut. Dunn has displayed throughout the siege.

I feel highly indebted to the exertions of Capt. Cruikshanks of the 62d, Jordan of the 27th, and Pringle of the 21st, as well as to the Officers and men under them.

From Lieut. Dickons, of the Engineers, I received every assistance; and my Adjutant, Lieut. Hadfield, of the 35th, has been throughout indefatigably zealous.

I cannot conclude, Sir, without expressing my particular thanks to Capt. Nicholas, Assistant Quarter-Master-General, whose abilities and activity rendered him eminently useful. And I have the satisfaction of reflecting, that the support I have received from all ranks has enabled me to sell Scylla dear; and that General Regnier has obtained possession of this little heap of ruins with the loss of several hundreds of his best troops.

The return of our killed and wounded is annexed. We have lost some gallant men; but considering the weight of the enemy's fire, the number is by no means great.

I have the honour to be, &c.
G. D. ROBERTSON, Lieut.-Col.
Commandant Scylla Castle.

To Major-General Sherbrooke, commanding his Britannic Majesty's troops in Sicily.

Return of the killed and wounded of the detachments forming the British garrison of the Castle of Scylla, in Calabria, from the 4th to the 17th of Feb. 1808; viz.

Royal Artillery—3 gunners killed; 1 bombardier, 8 gunners wounded.

27th Reg. 1st. bat.—3 rank and file killed, 14 rank and file wounded.

58th Reg.—3 rank and file killed, 6 rank and file wounded.

62d Reg.—2 rank and file killed, 2 rank and file wounded.

Total—3 gunners, 8 rank and file killed; 1 bombadier, 3 gunners, 22 rank and file wounded.

(Signed) J. CAMPBELL, Brig. Gen.
Messina, Feb. 20, 1808. Adjutant. General.

[This Gazette also contains an account of the capture of the Actif lugger privateer of Dieppe, of 14 guns, by the Medusa. L'Actif had made but one capture, a collier brig, during her different cruises in the Channel, since her last fitting out in the beginning of September last.]

[This Gazette likewise contains an Order of Council, permitting, under certain regulations, the further importation, for six months, of a number of articles of provision, &c. specified in former Orders.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

SIR R. STRACHAN AND THE HOSTILE FLEETS.

The Princess Elizabeth packet, with mails from Sicily and Malta, has brought intelligence of Sir R. Strachan and his fleet. He joined Admiral Thornborough off Palermo, and their combined squadrons amount to sixteen sail of the line. They had seen no enemy's fleet; but it was ascertained at Gibraltar, that the Carthagena squadron was at Port Mahon by the latest accounts. The Toulon fleet had sailed on the 10th of February: and as the Rochefort squadron was said by the crew of a ship under convoy of the Sirius, to have passed the Bay of Pallas near Carthagena, on the 1st of March, some persons have conjectured, that the Rochefort and the Toulon fleets may have effected a junction.

Perhaps there now is reason to believe that the Rochefort squadron, concerning which so many reports have been cir culated, has not entered the Mediterranean, but proceeded towards the West Indies or America. In the beginning of this week, the following information was posted at Lloyd's:

"The Abram, Watson, arrived at Lancaster from Hayti, was boarded on the 14th of March, in lat. 30. long. 63. 41. by the Demarara brig of war, which had been dispatched to Bermuda by Sir J. T. DUCKWORTH off Martinique, and was on his return to the West Indies. Capt. CROFTON, of the Demarara, inserted in the Abram's log-book as follows:—

"Monday, March 14.

"On Monday, the 7th inst. the Mullet schooner fell in with a "French squadron, consisting of six sail of the line (one of "them a three decker), in Lat. 31. N. Long. 69. W. steering "W. N. W." The Mullett kept company three hours.

There can be little doubt but this is the Rochefort Squadron. The Floridas, which we believe have been ceded to France, were in all probability their point: and if they touch at the Chesapeak, we think it must be merely as a matter of convenience. But whatever be their destination, we have every reason to hope that some of our squadrons will overtake them. Should St. Domingo or Martinique be their object (and in that case it is difficult to conceive why they have gone so far to the Northward), they will be fortunate if they escape both Sir J. DUCKWORTH and Sir A. COCHRANE. That the enemy are going against Nova Scotia or Canada, we cannot believe: their force is too small. If, indeed, the Americans were determined upon war with us, and have made preparations to invade our American possessions, we should not be disinclined to believe that this squadron meant to co-operate with them—but we have not heard of any military preparations. Are the enemy going to make an attack upon Newfoundland?—This is barely probable.

Upon the whole then the Floridas appear to be the only probable place of their destination. Circumstances which took place some time ago, but which did not excite much attention at the time, are now recollected and brought in aid of this conjecture. MOREAU's journey in such haste to the southern frontiers of the United States, is now supposed to have had some relation to the views of the French upon the Floridas. It is said also, that the last advices from New York brought an account of sixty French Officers having landed there, and proceeded to the Floridas. It is certain that the wife of General MOREAU, several months ago, left America for France, for the alleged purpose of arranging some family concerns, but with the real object, as was supposed, of making her husband's peace with her husband's persecutor. We know it was said in the American Papers, some time ago, that BONAPARTE was not quite determined to let the Americans take possession of Louisiana, though they had bought it; and that as to the Floridas, he was resolved to secure them for himself—he may think that the possession of them would enable him the better to awe the American Government; and certainly, the latter would find him a most vexatious and troublesome neighbour. Two thousand troops, the most that the Rochefort Squadron can carry, would indeed be alone sufficient to secure the Floridas; but where we have nothing but conjecture before us, the best we can do is to select the least improbable.

A letter was on Friday received from Liverpool, by a respectable house in the city, which stated, that a ship had arrived there from Boston after a short passage. It was understood that the vessel brought important intelligence, but there had not been time to ascertain what. In all probability, if there really be any intelligence, it is something relative to the arrival of the French Squadron in some part of America. The coincidence of dates confirm this opinion. It was on the 7th of March that the Mullet schooner fell in with the squadron; four days were sufficient to bring the intelligence to the Chesapeak, and three days more would convey it to Boston. Hence we have a month and a day for the voyage to England, with continued westerly winds.

Since writing the above, we have learnt that the Admiralty have received the following information: we do not, however, pledge ourselves for the accuracy of the statement:—

"Capt. DUBOIS, an American, arrived this day from Malaga; which place he left on the 25th of February. He reports, that on the 21st of February, seven sail of French line-of-battle ships were seen off Malaga: that forty-seven hours after, ten sail of British ships of war made signal off the same place. Both fleets were standing up the Mediterranean. What is very extraordinary, the Captain, on his passage to England, never saw a British man of war until he arrived in the Downs."

The Paris Papers, up to the 26th of March, from which we have given extracts, under the head of Foreign News, contain the regulations which the French Emperor has made concerning the Jews. The regulations are not of a nature particularly favourable to that people; though they contain some distinctions in favour of such Jews as appear to have conducted themselves uniformly well. These Papers contain also an account of the seizure of M. ALOPEUS, the Russian Minister at Sweden: a step which is severely blamed by the Moniteur: but for which the note of the Swedish Minister, M. D'ERRENSTEIN, gives strong reasons. The Moniteur goes on to state, that France has declared war against Sweden, whose coasts are stated to be in a most defenceless state. We find that nothing has been done at Boulogne, Dunkirk, or Ostend, beyond the reparation of the works that have been damaged by floods. Letters from Rome had arrived at Paris, declaring that the troops of the Pope were incorporated with the French.

We also insert papers of March the 14th, from Germany, of the same date from Lower Saxony, and of March the 15th and 16th, from Denmark. At Copenhagen every thing was prepared for the embarkation against Scania; and the Danish army was to be newly organized, upon a plan conformable to that of France. The flotilla which was in construction was to join and accompany the army. The Russians are stated to have obtained possession of Abo, the capital of Finland; and it is added, that the Swedes have burned the flotilla which was stationed there. This intelligence seems a little improbable; for so great an event in the outset of the war would probably have reached England by official communication. Besides, private letters which have been received in England from Copenhagen to the 27th ult. and from Hamburgh to the 3d inst. totally deny any such occurrences. The King of Sweden is still firm to his purpose: The Swedish head-quarters were still at Tavastus.

The Dutch Papers of the 30th ult. contain the Financial Message delivered by the King of Holland to the Legislative Body.

From Milan, we learn, that one of our Squadrons blockades the Russian Fleet in Trieste, and that Levins, on the coast of Dalmatia has been occupied by an English force.

The Mails from Malta and Gibraltar containing accounts to the 27th, mention the arrival of General SPENCER's Expedition at the latter port; and they further declare, that MURAT, who is now Grand Duke of Berg, has seized on the Spanish Provinces of Catalonia, Navarre, and Biscay.

There was on Friday a report in London, that the French troops had landed in Zealand, but the event is not mentioned in the letters from Heligoland, we are not inclined to believe it.

Accounts from Holland state, that a loan has been opened at Amsterdam, under the direction of the principal Merchants and Bankers, for fitting out small armed vessels

The first subscriptions, it is said, amounted to 500,000*l.* and the books were to close at the beginning of the present month.

INSURRECTION IN SPAIN.

Of the insurrection in Spain, which for several days past has so much occupied the public attention, we have inserted the fullest details in another part of our Paper.

The events which have now occurred, would once have set Europe in commotion. Every throne would have trembled, and every council would have been thunderstruck. But in these times we are accustomed to view the most heinous crimes and the most signal revolutions, without any expression of surprise. After witnessing so many miracles, we have ceased to wonder. But the train of innovations appear now to be almost concluded; and BONAPARTE, possessing every thing, will soon have little else to do, than to sit down and weep, like ALEXANDER, that no more worlds are left for him to conquer.

The conduct of the Prince of Peace, once the avowed favourite of France, has given rise to a variety of conjecture. Some persons imagine that he advised the King to emigrate, because he feared the French displeasure would overtake himself: others suppose that he was instructed by BONAPARTE to procure the secession of the Royal Family, in order that the vacancy might give a pretence to France for occupying the supreme power. Further intelligence of his fate must reach us before we ought, in justice, to set down the Prince of Peace as a traitor, however much we may blame his conduct on former occasions. At any rate, whatever his motive may have been, his advice seems to have been good: for Prussia affords a most conspicuous example how little is to be hoped by a Prince whom BONAPARTE is determined to ruin. By emigration, the King of Spain might have preserved his life, his liberty, his honour, if not his kingdom: now he is pretty sure to lose his kingdom and his honour: perhaps he may lose his liberty, and possibly even his life. It has been observed of old, that the distance is short between the prison and the grave of a Prince: Now, perhaps, it may with equal truth be said, that a Prince should consider the hour of death as not far distant from the hour of BONAPARTE's visitation.

FAMINE IN PORTUGAL.

The dispatches that were on the 10th inst. received by Ministers from Admiral Sir C. COTTON, off Lisbon, bring intelligence that General JUNOT sent out a flag of truce, with a message, which was delivered by a deputation of some of the principal persons of Portugal, to acquaint the British Admiral that there were not more than fourteen days provisions for the whole population of Portugal—but that he had secured the subsistence of his own army for six months. He therefore warned the Admiral, that upon the English name and character would rest the crime of starving a whole people. Mr. MICHAEL SETARO, and the other Members of the Deputation stated, that the kingdom was totally drained; that numbers were dying in the streets by famine, and that the French General had secured all the grain. The Deputies tendered to the Admiral water, fresh beef, mutton, pork, vegetables, and wine, if he would consent to permit the free passage into the Tagus of wheat and flour. The Admiral proposed that if the French army would withdraw, the embargo should be raised. The reply was, that it was not for the French army the request was made, since that army had ample means of subsistence, but for the people who had been abandoned by their Sovereign. The Admiral had no discretionary powers: he instantly dispatched the Coquette sloop with the advices, and it now is for our Government to determine what course they shall pursue.

At any rate, we cannot conceive that the reproach of starving a nation will attach to us: the French have been the invaders: the French have seized the provisions: and the French, who see the inhabitants dying in the paths, are the persons upon whom falls the duty of relief.

AFFAIRS OF ST. DOMINGO.

The most recent advices from Cape François, (St. Domingo) have brought us intelligence of an occurrence, which will possibly be deemed of sufficient importance to become the subject of legal investigation, or at least occasion some legislative provision for the future.

Some time since, there arrived at Cape François the Young Roscius, Captain Goodall, and shortly afterwards the Captain entered into a contract with Christophe for the sale of his vessel; a large sum of money was paid down, and one of the conditions of the sale was, that Capt. Goodall should be promoted to the rank of High Admiral of the Haytian fleet, and his first Officer, Mr. John M'Cullock, received the appointment of Rear Admiral.

In consequence of this singular appointment to a post of high naval rank, which could not have been accepted by a British subject without a licence from his Sovereign, were the State of Hayti already acknowledged by our Court as independent Power, which we believe has never taken place; an Expedition was soon afterwards fitted out against a fort under the sway of Petion, at Jean Rabel, a town on the north-west coast, not far from Cape St. Nichola Mole. Mr. M'Cullock was killed by a musket-ball; but the issue of the contest was the capture of the fort. A second fort was attacked in like manner, and the assailants were again successful. Mr. M'Cullock was buried with great pomp, and all the honours of war, at Cape François.

On the arrival of General Spencer's armament at Gibraltar, it was discovered, that the enemy, apprized of our intention to attack Ceuta, had thrown such a body of men into the place, and had exerted themselves in repairing the batteries with such effect, as to make it imprudent to proceed against it. Accordingly, it appears that the project was abandoned, and that the troops were proceeding to their ultimate destination. General Nightingale is on his return home with dispatches. Sir Sidney Smith sailed from Gibraltar on the 13th ult. in the Foudroyant, supposed for the Brazils.

A lucky man need only to be born.—Mr. Ingleby, the Emperor of all Conjurers, who never had any idea of the lottery in his life, was in company with some gentlemen on Friday evening, who told him much concerning the lottery. Mr. I. said in a joke, he would go home and dream of something; and, when he arose in the morning, he immediately insured the 6000 for 400 guineas, which fortunately was drawn; and we must certainly allow that to be fortunate, as we are sure his magic hand never touched the wheel.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Thursday, at twelve o'clock, his Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace, from Windsor, where he was met by the Dukes of York, Kent, Cumberland, and Sussex. At two o'clock his Majesty held a private Levee, when the following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:—

Rear-Admiral Berkeley, on his return from America, by Lord Mulgrave; the Right Hon. Standish O'Grady, on his being appointed Chief Baron of Ireland, by Sir Arthur Wellesley; Master Anson, on his being appointed a Page of Honour to the Queen, by the Earl of Harcourt; Major-General Oakes, on his being appointed to a command at Malta; Lieut.-Colonel Cunningham, on his going to the Brazils, by General Garth; and the Hon. Charles Townshend, by his father, Lord Bayning.

Viscount Strangford, his Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Portugal, took leave of his Majesty previous to his departure for the Brazils.

His Majesty then held a Privy Council, and gave audience to the Duke of Portland, and the other Cabinet Ministers; likewise to Mr. Ryder, the Judge Advocate, who laid before his Majesty the proceedings of some Courts Martial. Soon after six o'clock, his Majesty set off on his return to Windsor.

CITY.

Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of bread to be continued at 11d. the quartern loaf of wheaten, and 9½d. the household.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

On Wednesday, a Court of Directors was held, when the thanks of the Court were unanimously voted to Edward Parry, Esq. and Charles Grant, Esq. for their unremitted attention to the affairs of the Company, for the last year.—Same day, a ballot was taken for the election of six Directors.

At eight o'clock the glasses were finally closed, and delivered to the Scrutineers, who, at six o'clock, on Thursday morning, reported the numbers to be as under-mentioned, viz.—

J. A. Bannerman, Esq.	1156	Richard C. Plowden, Esq.	1616
John Hudleston, Esq.	1455	Abraham Robarts, Esq.	1349
Eyles Irvin, Esq.	613	George A. Robinson, Esq.	1337
Charles Mills, Esq.	1412	Robert Williams, Esq.	986
Thomas Parry, Esq.	1123

Whereupon the following were declared duly elected:—

John A. Bannermann, Esq. John Hudleston, Esq. Charles Mills, Esq. Richard C. Plowden, Esq. Abraham Robarts, Esq. and George A. Robinson, Esq.

Thursday, a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when John Hudleston, Charles Mills, Abraham Robarts, Richard C. Plowden, John A. Bannerman, and George Abercrombie Robinson, Esquires, took the usual oaths and their seats. Edward Parry and Charles Grant, Esquires, were chosen Chairman and Deputy Chairman for the year ensuing. The Court adjourned at six o'clock till Wednesday next.

Friday the outward-bound East India fleet sailed from Portsmouth with a fine breeze at W. N. W. under convoy of his Majesty's ship Thetis, Capt. Miller. The fleet is composed of the following ships, viz:—The William Pitt, Euphrates, Sovereign, and Sir Wm. Bensley, for Madras and Bengal.—The Europe, Lord Castlereagh, and Lord Keith, for St. Helena and Bengal.—The Alexander, for Madeira and Bengal.—The Northumberland, for Madeira, Madras, and Bengal.—The Vulture, for the South Seas.—Tottenham, Devaynes, Union, and General Stuart, homeward-bound, are up at Blackwall.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

Monday next being Easter Monday, Marquis Cornwallis, the Master of his Majesty's hounds, will turn out a fine young stag on Tower-hill, to be hunted by his Majesty's hounds. Great sport is expected, many noblemen and gentlemen hunters are already in the neighbourhood on the occasion, it being the last time of his Majesty's stag-hounds hunting this season.

EASTER HUNT.—The dashing Sportsmen of Cheapside and Whitechapel may now look forward in gay expectation for another day of annual jollity; a Deer will be turned out, we are told to-morrow, at Fairmaid's Bottom, as the Sporting Folks in that neighbourhood have procured one under the auspices of the Ranger of the Forest. All the bits of blood and sunday hacks of Goswell-street and Moorfields are in requisition, whilst jockey-caps and spur-leathers, boots and leather-breeches, form one gay scene of motley confusion. Should the Deer prove a mettled one, many a Cockney Sportsmen will be thrown out, and in crossing the Forest we have no doubt that many will be run in; indeed from the scratched faces and broken noses to be expected by these civic Actæons, there will doubtless be more bloodshed than even on a first of September.

Yoicks! hark forward! Were you at the hunt?—Was I at the hunt! why yes d—e; Did you see the Deer? See the Deer!—No. Did you see the hounds?—No. Did you see the horses?—No. Zounds! what a quiz; I was at the Hunt, Old Boy, that's your sort, that's life—Yoicks! hark forward!!!

BOXING.—The match between Young Belcher and Dogherty, which was formerly fixed to take place at Moulsey, was decided on Thursday on a summit, half a mile from the Rubbing-house, on Epsom Downs.

To detail the particulars of this combat would be only to state, that Belcher's fists were never away from Dogherty's face, and the blows of the former were put in with as much strength at the 19th round as at the commencement; but Dogherty was fighting under heavy hurts, as his figure demonstrated, and Belcher was amusing himself, as if sparring in the Fives Court. The 24th round reduced the battle to a certainty, notwithstanding Dogherty appeared determined not to resign till nature compelled him. In this round Belcher hit him three or four severe blows to the face, and at length, by a blow in the wind and neck at the same time, doubled him together so scientifically, that he fell like a helpless infant.—Nine other rounds were fought, in which Dogherty only faced his adversary, to fall without being hit. Belcher threw a somerset at the close of the battle, which lasted 35 minutes, and ran to the Rubbing-house, as were his seconds. Belcher's coolness and courage gave him so decided an advantage from the first round, that nothing but Dogherty's determined resolution could give him a chance, and that chance was in staying too long. Dogherty hits often open-handed, and measures his distance badly, but he shewed himself a real game man, labouring under these disadvantages. This match was for fifty guineas. Belcher had not even a hit which made any visible impression.

GENERAL IMPRESS FOR SEAMEN.

The warm and general impress which commenced on Friday se'nnight, has continued at all the ports, and has procured a large quantity of seamen. In this impress no protections were regarded; even coasting vessels were stripped of their crews, including many of those carrying fresh fish to the London market. An impress for seamen, without partiality, took place in the City of London, on Wednesday evening. A great number of seamen and deserters from the navy was represented to the Lord Mayor to have taken refuge in the city. His Lordship, upon this information, backed Press Warrants, and delivered them to the City Marshals, who, attended by some Constables and Officers of the Impress Service, took between 50 or 60 men, whom they lodged in the Compter, and on Thursday were examined at the Mansion House. Several were discharged, being men of good character, and who had never been at sea, and others as having protections; some were remanded till their statements could be ascertained, and the remainder were sent on board the tender.

SUICIDE, BY JAMES PAULL, ESQ.

James Paull, Esq. of election notoriety, put a period to his existence, between four and five o'clock on Friday evening, at his house, in Charles-street, St. James's-square, by cutting his throat. The particulars relative to this rash act, and the tragic end of this misguided and unfortunate man, are not exactly known; but it is supposed to have originated in the embarrassed state of his affairs. He returned home, it appears, from a gaming-house, about six o'clock, on Friday morning, and was observed to be, during the whole of the day, in a delirious state.—In the after part of the day he committed the above act, which of all acts the weakest, if it could be supposed that a man in possession of his natural faculties could put an end to his own existence. An Inquest was held on his body yesterday evening, about seven o'clock, and the Jury returned the usual verdict upon such occasions—Lunacy. Thus has this intemperate man been led on from step to step—malice seeming to be the reigning principle of his actions—until at last, tired of himself and his existence, he has ended his own day in the prime of life.

OLD BAILEY.

Wednesday the Sessions ended, when sentence of death was passed on Sarah Ward, for stealing several articles of plate, the property of A. Bruce, in a dwelling-house, convicted in January sessions last, and judgment respited; J. Smith, J. Moore, and W. Davis, for a burglary in the dwelling-house of T. Hill; Jane Morris, for stealing goods, the property of A. De la Beere and others, in the dwelling-house of P. Sirrel; W. Cooley, for stealing goods, value 6*l.* and upwards, in the dwelling house of J. Hall; and Eleanor Thompson, for robbing W. Bates on the highway of a seven shillings piece; G. Wilkinson, for stealing 70*l.* the property of W. Wykes, in his dwelling-house; and W. Shepherd, for robbing G. Goddard on the highway of goods and monies value 6*l.* 4*s.* The Sessions are adjourned to the 1st of June.

BIRTHS.

At Whitehaven, the Lady of Sir Joseph Stenhouse, of a son, being her Ladyship's eleventh child, all of whom are now living.

At Exeter, on the 15th ult. the Lady of Lieutenant-Colonel Watson, of the 5th Dragoon Guards, of a son.

MARRIED.

On Monday last, Henry John Shepherd, Esq. of Lincoln's Inn, to the Right Hon. Lady Mary Primrose, daughter to the Earl of Rosebery.

On Sunday last, by special licence, at Brighton, Brigadier-General Henry Frederic Campbell, to Mrs. Knox, widow of the late Lieut.-Colonel Knox, of the 1st Regiment of Guards.

On Tuesday last, at Great Yarmouth, Mr. T. Gent, to Miss Horfor, daughter of Mr. Wm. Horfor.

DIED.

On Monday morning last, at his mansion at Rochampton, Benjamin Goldsmid, Esq.—It is said he has left property to the amount of 400,000*l.* which goes chiefly to his children, with a handsome annuity to his widow. His three brothers are named his executors.

On the 6th instant, after a short illness, Mr. William Dacie, of Mount-Row, Lambeth.

GRATIS.

A PORTRAIT OF HIS MAJESTY GEORGE III.

BEAUTIFULLY ENGRAVEN BY SCRIVEN, AND INTENDED AS A

THE NATIONAL REGISTER,

Has been THIS DAY DELIVERED GRATIS to all the Newsmen for the purpose of being transmitted to the Subscribers; the Proprietors therefore hope that no Subscriber will be disappointed of receiving it. Our Patrons in the country are requested to observe that the Portrait of his Majesty will be forwarded to them by the safest and most convenient mode. But as it will be impossible for the Newsmen to forward the Portrait by the Post, without incurring the risk of spoiling the Print, and the Expence of Postage, the Proprietors beg leave to submit to their Friends the necessity of their requesting some Bookseller in the Country to obtain it from his Agents in London, who will inclose it in his parcel. This will obviate every difficulty, and secure its safe arrival. To any of the Friends of the Paper, who may be disappointed of the Portrait, or to any Friend commissioned by them, an impression will be gratuitously delivered at the Office of The National Register. But it will be necessary for the Subscriber, in this case, to send his real name, and place of abode, in a note addressed to the Proprietors.

Those who may have neglected to complete their sets, are requested to give early orders, to prevent the chance of disappointment.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER SEVENTEEN.

ON THE DANGERS OF THE PENDING BILL FOR ALTERING THE COURSE OF PROCEEDINGS ON INDICTMENTS AND INFORMATIONS.

A fortnight ago we called the attention of the public, and more particularly of the Peers, to the Bill introduced by Sir Vicary Gibbs, the Attorney-General, which already has passed the House of Commons, and which, if it shall be sanctioned by the Lords and by the Crown, must strike a deadly blow at the liberties of the English nation. We at that time had no opportunity of inserting the whole mass of proof that bears against this unconstitutional measure: but the more we have considered it, the more we have been convinced of its dangerous tendency, and we therefore think it our duty to explain most fully the principles of the old law and constitution that must be violated by the enactment of this Bill, and the peculiar aggravations with which it will fall upon the poorer classes of society.

The great principle of the British constitution we take to be this: that every man not convicted of any crime shall be protected in the free enjoyment of his life, his liberty, and his property, unless that free enjoyment be incompatible with the well-being of the community. Persons accused of treason or felony, certainly cannot be safely trusted with those privileges even before their trial: because any guilty man, in possession of his liberty, will abandon every thing for the sake of securing his life, and when such a criminal shall have escaped, there can be but small satisfaction to injured society in merely confiscating his property. But in all cases short of treason and felony, our lawgivers forbade the seizure of any man's person before conviction: conceiving that few would fly their country for fear of conviction on an offence which could not affect their lives, and probably considering also, that to those who, by the dread of punishment for a minor offence, should be induced to desert their home, the banishment alone would be a sufficient penance. In the 26th and 35th years of his present Majesty's reign, it was judged expedient to authorize a previous arrest upon certain offences relating to the public revenue: and an arrest upon mesne process is allowable, as every body knows, in civil cases of debt. The reasons of these anomalies are however clear, if not incontrovertible. The power of arresting a defaulter to the public revenue is a power that can seldom be twisted to purposes of private malice: and the temptation to error in this particular is so strong and so frequent and the chance of detection so flattering, that a more than ordinary degree of severity may here perhaps be necessary for preserving the good order of society. To the question of arrest upon mesne process for debt, the last argument applies very forcibly: every body knows how easy it is to contract debts, how eagerly debts are contracted, how greatly honest creditors perpetually suffer, and how infinitely more general the mischiefs of the practice would become, if debtors were permitted to walk securely about their business till the period of the adjudication against them. Nay, the very fear of arrest perpetually produces payment of the debt when all other means have been found ineffectual. But these arguments must not be stretched beyond their natural reach: we are not to allow perpetual encroachments on the liberties of the people without reasons of a very strong and imperious kind. How little reason is to be found for the Bill now introduced by Sir Vicary Gibbs, which proposes to extend yet further the dangerous system of arrest, all impartial readers will easily judge on perusing the propositions made in the Bill itself, which goes to enact:

"That when any person shall be charged with any offence for which he or she may be prosecuted by indictment or information in the Court of King's Bench, not being treason or felony, and the same shall be made appear to any judge of the said Court by affidavit or by certificate of an indictment or information being filed against such person in the said Court for such offence, it shall be lawful for such Judge to issue his warrant, and cause such person to be apprehended in order to his or her being bound to the King with sufficient sureties in such sum as expressed in the warrant, and to answer, &c.: And such person, in case he or she shall neglect or refuse to become bound as aforesaid, may be committed to the common Goal of the county, city, or place where the offence shall have been incurred, or where he or she shall have been apprehended, there to remain, &c. And in case he or she shall not enter an appearance and a plea or demurrer in the said Court, within a certain number of days after receiving a copy of the indictment or information, the prosecutor may cause an appearance, and also the plea of Not Guilty, to be en-ought to be music a little congenial with the subject of the drama—Lochaber, and Gin thou wer't mine awn thing, are very appropriate tunes for the relief of the Scotch play of Douglas; but what should we say to a Manager, who should give the public such a jig as Molly put the kettle on, by way of intermede to the tragedy of Venice Preserved? Mr. Cobbett has no care of this sort. If he have begun never so forcibly—if he have declaimed, with all the ardour and force of his naturally strong tho' vulgar intellect, against constitutional violations that really deserve animadversion—if he have entered on a subject which possesses sufficient elevation to reflect even fame on a person who may treat it with tolerable success—suddenly he descends from his pride of place, and rushes into the lowest malignity of personal attack, the vulgarest language of a quarrelling tinker. He certainly is a great adept in the science of intellectual prize-fighting; his knack for introducing vulgar illustrations, and ill-natured stories, may be very useful in some companies: no doubt it will have great effect next month, at the anniversary of Sir Francis Burdett's election, when the porter-drinking politicians of Westminster shall assemble to celebrate the triumph of mobbing and madness; but why does Mr. Cobbett torment his readers, among whom there probably are several gentlemen, with slang that is so much beneath them?

" Inceptis gravibus plerumque, et magnæ professis, " Purpureus, latè qui splendeat, unus et alter
" Assuitur pannus.—Amphora cœpit
" Institui; currente rotâ cur urceus exit?
" Desinit in piscem mulier formosa superne:
" Spectatum admissi, risum teneatis, amici?"

In this Number of April 16th, which we have here been reviewing, how manifold are the digressions of this angry politician! The Reversion Bill, a great and interesting topic, is the professed subject of his paper: and in the course of his dissertation, he abuses the Whig Club, gives advice to Mr. Waithman, attacks all oppositions, abuses Mr. Sheridan, cuts at Mr. Alexander Davison, and tells us about the Members for Westminster riding in a dirt-covered car. What has all this to do with the Reversion Bill?

But above all, what secret influence has withheld Mr. Cobbett from denouncing in the strongest terms that invidious, that odious system, by which the Reversion Bill was disconcerted in the House of Lords? Where is the loud tongue of Mr. Cobbett when real danger bids him sound its alarum to his country? What becomes of the people's unbiassed, uninfluenced, immoveable champion when lofty blood runs feverish and hot, maddens the nerves of powerful men, and lets them loose to fight against the rights of meaner subjects? Some writer more acquainted with the secrets of Botley, must tell us why Mr. Cobbett has spared when mercy is a crime, and spread the mantle of darkness where day-light should have flashed the broadest and clearest splendour of its noon-tide!

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

SWEDEN.—BULLETIN.

" Gripsholm Castle, March 30.

" His Royal Majesty received yesterday two reports from Count Klingspor, Commander in Chief of the army in Finland, bearing date, 'Head-quarters, Longfors and Nerper, not far from Wasa, March 20th and 23d.' The army continues, in good order, its march to Ulenberg, in order to form a junction with [illegible] Count Cronstedt, Chief of Brigade. The [illegible] with the enemy's light troops [illegible] took place, under the orders of [illegible] General, and of Colonel Gripenhielm, [illegible] which his Majesty's troops, with the [illegible] attack of the enemy, far superior in number, and covered the retreat of the rest of the army, which carried away all the magazines formed in Bromeberg.

" Count Cronstedt, Chief of Brigade, reported from Knopio, Alipitka, and Idensoben, under date the 13th, 16th, and 18th March, that, with the troops under his command, he is continuing his march to Ulenberg, pursuant to his orders. He had some severe engagements with the enemy on the 11th, near Lippanirta, and the 15th, near Knopio, during which a cannonade was for some time kept up on both sides, without the Russian troops having been able, notwithstanding their great superiority in number, to make any successful attack on his Majesty's troops; they were, on the contrary, continually repulsed."

His Swedish Majesty's Proclamation, touching the Levy en Masse, dated Stockholm, March 14, 1808.

" We, Gustavus Adolphus, make known, that, as the Eastern frontiers of the Empire are already attacked by the enemy, and those in the West and North are likewise threatened, we feel ourselves called upon to make the utmost exertions for the defence of our invaded country. For this purpose, in order that we may be able to raise a sufficient force for attacking the enemy, it is our will that all young men, of 18 to 25 years, both inclusive, of whatever rank or condition they may be, who have not enlisted in the regular army, militia, or navy, shall hold themselves in readiness to take up arms for the defence of our native land, and, assemble at such places as shall be appointed out to them at a moment's notice."

Stockholm, March 18.—The French General of Division, Grandjean, informed Lieutenant Wahrenberg, by a letter, of the 6th of October last year, by General Brune's order, that the Swedish packets would not be molested on their arrival at Grossen Zuker, in the Isle of Rugen, but be allowed to enter that port, until the exchange of French and Swedish prisoners should have been completed. In spite of this solemn assurance, two Swedish packets, which on the strength thereof were dispatched from Istadt to Rugen, have been detained there by the French commanding Officer, and declared good and lawful prizes. On board of one of them was his Majesty's Aide-de-Camp, Major Darmfelt, who was sent with a flag of truce to Rugen, and, contrary to all the usages of war, detained in Stralsund under a military guard; and on board the other was Major Schontz, of the artillery, who was likewise declared a prisoner of war. This conduct on the part of the French, by no means unprecedented, is recorded as an additional proof of the well-known fact, that no reliance can be placed on the most solemn and most sacred promise of that people.

March 26.—Lieutenant-General Baron Carpalon has made a report, dated the 19th inst. stating, that the English squadron which was frozen in near Gottenburgh, and consists of three sail of the line, two frigates, and three brigs of war, got afloat the said day, and is ready to set sail with the first fair wind and weather.

By advices from Helsingburg received to-day we learn, that, as late as the 26th inst. the French had not crossed the Belts, though it had been confidently reported they were to have embarked for Zealand on the 15th. Count Mioliki, the Danish Minister at Stockholm, and M. Gildenpalm, the Secretary, arrived at Helsinburg a few days since, under a Swedish guard, and embarked in a flag of truce for Elsineur.

April 8.—The day before yesterday arrived here his Britannic Majesty's ship Dictator, of 64 guns, together with the Tartarus bomb, Salcette frigate, Daphne, Snake, and Charger gun-brigs, &c.; these ships have brought a great quantity of arms and ammunition for the Swedish Government, and a large sum of money. Last night also arrived Admiral Sir Samuel Hood, in the Centaur, with several other ships, whose names I cannot yet learn; many more, I am told, are gone to the Sound. These arrivals have diffused a general satisfaction here, as we now think ourselves secure from any invasion of the French and Danes; though, indeed, we have as yet no account to be depended upon, of the French having come over to Zealand, or even of their having entered Holstein. There is no news to-day from Finland; nor do I hear that operations have yet commenced on the frontiers of Norway, where a considerable army is assembled.

SPAIN.

Madrid, March 11.—Yesterday there was a grand gala at Court (which at present is at the Royal Palace of Aranjuez), on account of the birth of the infant Don Francisco de Paula Antonio Maria, the third son of his Majesty.

WEST INDIES.

BRIDGETOWN, BARBADOES, MARCH 2.

Dispatches were received here on Sunday by Rear-Admiral Sir A. Cochrane, from Captain Selby, of his Majesty's ship Cerberus, from Marigalante, informing him of the capture of that Island by a small squadron under his command, consisting of the Cerberus, Circe, and Camilla frigates, and Express brig: a detachment of seamen and marines from the frigates, amounting to 200 men, headed by Captain Pigot, of the Circe, effected a landing there, without any opposition, on the morning of the 3d inst. and carried the town before the enemy were prepared to make any effectual resistance. The Island was literally taken by surprise, and much in the manner of Curacoa, although not to be put in competition with that very gallant achievment, and was undertaken, as appears, without any previous concert with, or instructions from, the Rear-Admiral. The only defence attempted was with a light field-piece, commanding the principal street, but which the enemy was driven from with pikes and fixed bayonets before they could load it a second time; and being closely pressed, they surrendered at discretion. All the means of defence which the island possessed consisted of only one 4-pounder, three 12's, two 18's, and three 24's, disposed in six different batteries along the coast; and with 250 stand of arms, and about 150 barrels of powder, form the whole return of ordnance and ammunition. Marigalante is but an inconsiderable Island, of rather a circular form, being about five leagues long and four broad. It is remarkably fertile, producing coffee and cotton in great abundance; it is situated S. E. of Guadaloupe, and contiguous to Point-a-Petre, so that the most effectual blockade of that port (the chief resort of the enemy's privateers) is now in our power.

LIBERY AND INDEPENDENCE!

ORDER OF THE DAY OF THE ARMY, FEB. 11, 1808.

After having paid the last duties and the last honours to the remains of the intrepid M'Culloch, and of the heroes who fell with him in the field of honour, we proceed to acquaint the army with the successes of the naval forces of the State of Hayti.

On the 2d inst. the squadron of the State, consisting of the brig the Foudroyant, and of the cutters L'Avant-garde and La Province du Nord, which sailed from the Cape the 31st of January, under the command of Rear-Admiral M'Culloch, and of the Chief of Division Antoine Parisien, attacked the two gallies of the Rebels, La Constitution and La Guerriere, which were at anchor in the road of Jean Rabel, and protected by the fort and by several battalions of troops. After an action of several hours, La Constitution and La Guerriere was cast upon the coast and burnt.

This event, which was prepared with that wisdom which characterises all the measures of his Highness the President, gives the most fatal blow to the traitors and infamous rebels who still cling to the odious gang of Petion.

The loss of the enemy was considerable, and we may consider it as the commencement of the ruin of his navy, which our brave seamen will not fail to accomplish.

This morning the funeral service of Admiral M'Culloch and four seamen, who fell in the battle of the 2d, was celebrated in the Cathedral of the Cape, in the presence of his Royal Highness the President, with all the pomp due to the memory of these intrepid defenders of lawful authority and of liberty. Our loss consisted of three killed and five wounded, among whom is the Captain of the frigate Bastyen.

By Order of HENRY CHRISTOPHE.

5th year of independence.

ORDER OF THE DAY OF THE ARMY, FEB. 22. YEAR 5.

As fruitless an attempt as any that has yet been made by the Rebels, lately took place against the parish of Mirebalais, but they paid dearly for their boldness. The brave Marshal Pierre Toussaint, seconded by Brigadier-General Alexandre, jun. totally defeated and put them to flight. This affair is a miniature of the ever-memorable one of St. Marc. The Rebel Baudes, the Chief Artillerist of the Rebels of Port aux Crimes, was killed. The famous Comedian Lys, who commanded in concert with Baudes, had his thigh fractured. The Rebels left the field covered with their dead; we also took a standard from them, and a good many prisoners. This action does great honour to Marshall P. Toussaint, who has defeated the projects of the partizans of Petion, who expected to surprise Mirebalais.

The Commandant Louis Ladouceur also deserves the praise of the President for the zeal and indefatigable activity displayed by him on that occasion, by pursuing the Rebels into the woods, and reducing them to a state of despair.

His Highness the President, on the first appearance of the Rebels, joined the cordon with all dispatch, but he learnt their defeat almost as soon as their arrival. His Highness visited the towns of Gonaives, St. Marc, Dessalines, &c. and organized the different military and financial Administrative Bodies of the Province of the West; also those of Marshall Toussaint. He was every where highly pleased with the state of the public spirit of that Province, and with the marks of attachment which he received from all classes of the people. The army is completely cloathed and equipped at every point. Each corps, with its appropriate uniform, rivals the regularity, the discipline, and martial appearance of European troops.

THE LAW OF PETION, RELATIVE TO THE BLOCKADE OF HAYTI.

LIBERTY! EQUALITY!

REPUBLIC OF HAYTI.

The Senate on the proposal of one of its members, considering, that it imports to the interest of the Republic to adopt proper measures to take away from Henry Christophe all means to keep up his rebellion,

Declares, that there is urgency, and decrees as follows:—

All the ports of Hayti, under the domination of Henry Christophe, are declared in a state of revolt.

The President of the Republic of Hayti is invited to send the ships of the Republic on a cruise on the coast occupied by the enemies, in order to interrupt the FOREIGN SHIPS which shall be cleared for those ports, and to bring them, for their own safety, into the ports submitted to the Republic.

The coasting ships taken upon the coasts of the enemy, or cleared from such ports, are declared lawful prizes.

Letters of Marque shall be granted to all those who are wishing to arm against the Rebels, observing the formalities of ancient laws relative to cruizing.

The Captains of the ships of the Republic are ordered, upon their personal responsibity, to cause such foreign individuals and properties which they shall have intercepted, to be respected.

(Signed) LOUIS AUGUSTE DAUMEE, President,
S. BOURJOLY MONE, LELAGE VARREIN, } Secretaries.

In the name of the Republic.

The President of Hayti orders that the present law be published and executed, and the Seals of the Republic affixed to it.

(Signed) PETION.

STATE PAPER.

ANSWER OF SWEDEN TO THE DANISH DECLARATION OF WAR.

"The Court of Denmark had formed an alliance with France, was prepared to receive French troops in its country, collected transport vessels in its ports, fitted out all its ships in the road of Copenhagen, to cover a French expedition against Sweden, and then issued a Declaration of War. Denmark accuses Sweden of being the cause of this rupture, because she did not present compliments of condolence on the loss of her fleet, because she would not co-operate to avenge that humiliation, and especially because she sought aid from England against aggressions.

"The relations of the King towards Denmark were those of mere peace. There was no alliance or convention between them, pointing out to the two Courts any common course for their political conduct. Therefore, when Sweden, Russia, and Prussia, fought in conjunction against France, Denmark, sheltered by her neutrality, appeared the friend of all. The King beholding this system, and convinced by some explanations demanded, in the course of the year 1806, of the impossibility of obtaining from Denmark a change of measures favourable to Sweden, could not entertain a hope that the naval force of Denmark could ever be serviceable to him; on the contrary, after the peace of Tilsit he had every reason to fear that by the suggestions of Russia and France it might be one day turned against him. His Majesty therefore thought proper to observe a profound silence relative to the events which passed in the vicinity last autumn, leaving to England the task to justify those events hereafter.

"It is due to truth, however, to declare that the Court of London did not invite Sweden to take part in this expedition, nor confide it to her till the moment of its being put into execution. Therefore not the slightest movements were made in Sweden on this occasion. The English fleet arrived and departed without entering into any port of Sweden; and the auxiliary troops landed in Pomerania were given back, by virtue of a separate article in the convention concluded at London, relative to this object, on the 17th of June, 1807, when certainly there was as yet no reference to this expedition. The following is the article.

'It is fully understood, that in case unforeseen circumstances should render the object of this Convention impracticable, or that his Britannic Majesty should find it necessary to withdraw the said troops (the German Legion) from Swedish Pomerania, the stipulation of this Convention shall in no manner prevent his Britannic Majesty from giving such orders as he may judge proper with respect to the ulterior disposition of these troops, which are now placed under the orders of his Swedish Majesty.

'The Court of London has since fully justified this enterprize, and the experience of every day justifies it; numerous French armies remained in Lower Saxony, and overawed the North; there were still nations to subjugate, ports to shut, and forces to direct against England; they were to penetrate thither, whatever the expence might be: they would have acted in any case, and under any pretence that might have offered, and yet now it is the expedition against the Danish fleet which is the rallying word of the whole league!'

"It is remarkable that the Danish Government, already beset by French troops, overpowered, excited, and even paid, by France, issues a declaration of war against Sweden, without daring even to name the power which forces it to act: it labours to find out grievances, and reasons for its determination, that it may appear to have a will of its own: it cites the remonstrances of Sweden against the stoppage of the Swedish mails as vexatious, while, in its sundry enactments against English correspondents, it would not suffer it to pass even according to treaty; and it declares, that it is imperiously obliged to adopt those measures: it pretends to know the thoughts of the King, and is pleased to construe them as hostile, while itself, for some months, had concerted an act of aggression against Sweden: it pretends to argue from the interests of the country, though it has abandoned its own interests, and even its existence, to a foreign influence: in fine, it reproaches Sweden with having provided for her defence by a subsidiary treaty, though itself is paid for an act of aggression, and then it pronounces, though, indeed, with a kind of timidity, the word mercenary—an imputation which the Government that lays it had probably cruelly dictated to it.

"It is proper here to render to his Britannic Majesty the most authentic solemn testimony, that in all his transactions with Sweden he never demanded offensive measures, nor required any thing that was not perfectly compatible with its tranquillity and independence. The most recent and convincing proof of this is the promptitude with which his Ministry acceded to the proposal of the King for the pacification of the Baltic by a formal promise not to send thither any ships of war on conditions useful and honourable to all the North. Let the Danish Government read in this proposition the complete refutation of the complaints of which the Manifesto against Sweden is composed: and in the moments when it shall return to itself, let it compare the state of things which the King has desired with that which France and Russia wish. Let all the allies of France read in this conduct of England the difference between the connections which unite the two Courts, and those which enchain them, and let them pronounce on which side is to be found a due regard for particular interests, and a just moderation on account of the general good.

"Denmark herself has been, during a long time, the object of this moderation, and did not cease to be so till she became absolutely dangerous. When the North was outraged by the devastation of Lower Saxony, by the oppression of the Hanseatic towns, what did she to avenge them? Sweden, England, Prussia, and Russia made war for this object: but no one thought of forcing Denmark to take part in it. She was the ally of Russia then as well as at present. Why did she not embrace her cause? What could she then allege for her tranquillity which Sweden cannot now allege? All this is explained by the single fact, which she endeavours to conceal, that she is at present under the influence of the French Government. Had England followed the principles of this enemy, she would not have waited the moment of her surrender to disarm her; she would have invaded her several years before; she would have guarded her; and all this with a view to the good of the North. Her ancient alliance with Russia is made a pretext for this aggression, though all the world knows that it is merely defensive, and that it remained suspended during the late wars of Russia, when perhaps that power might have claimed it.

"The Court of Denmark, in order to justify its proceedings, hesitates not to make all kinds of assertion, dares to defend the injustice of Russia, and betrays a premeditated plot, and all this it does to conceal the chief, nay, the only reason, which is that Denmark is the ally of France.

"But injustice and falsehood find their end, and honour and trust will triumph in their turn. His Majesty, relying on the justice of his cause, hopes, with the conscious pride of reigning over a brave and loyal people, so often tried by dangers, and always supported under them by the Almighty, that the same Providence will vouchafe to bless his arms, and restore to his subjects a safe and honourable peace, to the confusion of his enemies."

"Stockholm, March 21."

PROVINCIALS.

Last week, a valuable mare, belonging to Mr. Podmore, farmer, near Hawarden, Flintshire, was suddenly taken ill, after drinking some water in a pond, and all efforts to swallow any thing proved ineffectual. She swelled remarkably large, and lived two or three days in the most excruciating agony, when she died. On opening her, nothing was found in her bowels that could occasion her death; but on cutting open the wind-pipe, a large toad was discovered alive!—which she is supposed to have taken into that orifice on drinking the water.

A few days since as some children were gathering primroses and violets, on a sunny bank in the parish of Walberton, near Arundel, one of them, the son of Mr. Randal, was bitten on his arm, by an adder, the venom of which caused such a violent swelling and inflammation, that the poor child's life was considered in imminent danger. A young man went afterwards to the spot, and with a stick destroyed three of these venemous reptiles.

About a week since, a Nobleman's game-keeper, in Kent, shot a hare, which, on taking up, he found to be very big with young; he therefore opened her with care, and drew forth two living leverets, which, on being wiped dry, skipped about the dead animal, and actually sucked her as long as warmth would admit the flow of milk. One of them died soon afterwards; but the other, we believe, is in a fair way of recovery.

A shocking accident befel the lady of W. G. ALTHORPE, Esq. of Clewer, Surrey, on Monday night. Mrs. Althorpe, her son, and two daughters, had returned home from a visit, when the former went into her bed-room, leaving her family in the drawing-room underneath. The shrieks of the mother alarmed her children, and on their hastening up stairs, Mrs. A. was lying on the floor with her garments literally reduced to tinder. Surgical aid was administered as quick as possible, but the unfortunate lady died, in about three hours after the accident happened. The deceased has left eight children to bewail her loss.

Lately, as a butcher and his wife, of the name of Bevan, were returning home from Chepstow market, with a horse and cart, in going over the Undy bridge, they fell into the water and were drowned: it is supposed they had fallen asleep in the cart through fatigue, and the horse being left to himself overturned the cart, under which the bodies were found. The woman was nearly ready to lye-in: they have left four infants, two of which are twins of 14 months old.—The same night, a man employed in a paper-mill, at Mounton, near Chepstow, got entangled in the wheel, and was crushed to death.

A few days since the following distressing circumstance happened at Hull. A woman of the name of Stather, being employed in cleaning her room, with her back to the chimney, a boy about three years of age caught hold of a kettle upon the fire, and putting its mouth under the spout, poured a quantity of boiling water down its throat, which scalded it so dreadfully, that it languished about twenty-four hours, and then expired.

Last week at Coaxey, near Wells, a young man, of the name of Pridden, having occasion to go to a blacksmith's shop on business, some irritating language took place between him and the blacksmith's apprentice, and the capenter struck him, when the lad immediately thrust a piece of red hot iron into the carpenter's side, and killed him on the spot. Verdict—Manslaughter.

EXECUTIONS.—On Saturday se'nnight, T. Sutton, aged 24; J. Chapman, 36; and W. Fuller, 26, were executed on the Castle-hill, Norwich.—Sutton was a remarkable instance of the effects of an unprincipled education. His father suffered an ignominious death, and his brother was transported. His first inducement to crime seems to have been a wish to join the latter at Botany Bay; to this end he committed two robberies upon General Money, with whom he lived, and was tried twice; his second sentence confined him to the hulks for seven years.—At the expiration of this period, he returned to Trowse, his native village, and on application to General Money, as to his future life, that gentleman provided him the means of an honest livelihood.—This was, however, frustrated by an attachment to a female, who left him at a time when his hopes were fixed upon an union with her. Courses of vice followed: and with the mere intention of committing some act which might subject his life to the law, he set fire to the stacks and premises of General Money, the crime for which he suffered death. It is remarkable that he should have chosen his only benefactor as the object of his injury. After condemnation, he conducted himself with much penitence. J. Chapman and W. Fuller, are victims to an offence arising out of a breach of the game laws. They were poachers, and in an encounter with Lord Cholmondeley's watchers, they fired upon and wounded W. Bussey, the principal keeper. Since their sentence, they have conducted themselves in the most exemplary manner: considerable efforts were made to obtain their reprieve, but without effect.

TUESDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

Admiralty Office, April 19, 1808.

Copy of a Letter from Captain Parker, of his Majesty's ship Stately, to the Hon. W. W. Pole, dated off Zealands Odde, March 25, 1808.

Sir—Inclosed I transmit to you, for the information of my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, a Copy of my Letter to Vice-Admiral Russell, acquainting him with the capture and destruction of the Danish ship of the line Prince Christian Frederick, of 74 guns, on the night of the 22d of March.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) GEORGE PARKER.

His Majesty's ship Stately, off Zealands Odde, March 25.

Sir—It is with much satisfaction I have the honour to acquaint you with the capture and destruction of the Danish ship of the line, Prince Christian Frederic, of 74 guns. Proceeding towards the Great Belt, in company with his Majesty's ship Nassau, at two p. m. on the 22d inst. we observed a strange sail; and the signal being made to chace, at 4 p. m. Greenall on the coast of Jutland bearing N. W. by N. distant ten miles, we discovered that it was an enemy; and at five p. m. ascertained the chace to be a Danish ship of the line. I now saw that it was evidently the intention of the enemy to run his ship on shore; and as the night was approaching, he might hope that, in our pursuit of him in the dark, we would have the same fate. This, I have since been assured, was his design. At 45 minutes past 7 p. m. Captain Campbell, in the Nassau, got up with the enemy, and commenced the action, and in a few minutes after the Stately closed; a running fight was now maintained for a considerable time, the enemy fighting with great obstinacy, until we succeeded in getting very near, and gave some close broadsides, on which she struck at about half past nine p. m.—At this moment the ships were within two cables lengths of the shore of Zealand; and before my First Lieutenant who took possession of the Danish ship, could cut away her anchor, she grounded. Fortunately this ship and the Nassau brought up near to her. During the remaining part of the night we were employed in taking out the prisoners; and at day-light of the 23d it was found impossible to get the captured ship afloat, the wind blowing strong on the shore, and that therefore the only course I could follow was to destroy her. The necessity for doing this, and for placing our own ships out of danger, soon became apparent, as the Danes were preparing their artillery on the coast, and as our ships were at anchor only two cables length from the beach, they would have done us great injury. After removing the prisoners and wounded, in doing which we experienced much difficulty from the wind blowing strong, and a good deal of sea running, the enemy's ship was set on fire in the evening of the 23d, and in a short time blew up. I am happy to say our loss has been small. It is trifling when compared with the enemy, where the slaughter was great, he having 55 killed and eighty-eight wounded. We have, however, received considerable damage in our masts and rigging. The Prince Christian Frederick was a very fine ship, copper-bolted, commanded by Captain Jayson, with a complement of six hundred and twenty men, and had five hundred and seventy-six on board. I feel much indebted to Captain Campbell for his zeal and ability in the commencement and during the action, and, to the officers, ship's company, and royal marines of his ship. My warmest gratitude and praise is due to the officers and privates of royal marines, of this ship, for their brave and gallant conduct during the action, displaying throughout the cool intrepidity of British seamen. The same spirit animated both ships. I beg leave to recommend in the strongest manner to the patronage of my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, Mr. David Sloan, my First Lieutenant, to whom I am greatly indebted, not only for his brave and spirited conduct in the action, but also for his unwearied exertion in removing the prisoners and wounded from the Danish ship, and setting her on fire. He possesses, in an eminent degree, every quality requisite to form the officer and seaman.

Herewith you will receive a return of the killed and wounded.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) GEO. PARKER.

Copy of a Letter transmitted by Rear-Admiral Sir Edward Pellew, Bart.

His Majesty's ship Psyche, at Sea, off Java, Sept. 3, 1807.

Sir,—I have the honour to acquaint you, that proceeding in the execution of your orders of the 18th of June last, his Majesty's ships Psheye and Caroline, on the 29th of Aug. reconnoitred the Port of Souraybaya, and by a ship from Batavia (captured the following day) ascertained the situation of the enemy's line of battle ships, which are still inactive there, and represented as being in too bad a state to admit of repair.

As our success in a great measure depended on the intelligence the enemy might receive of our appearance on the coast, not a moment was lost in proceeding to Samarary, off which port the Psyche was enabled to anchor at midnight, the Caroline having previously parted company in chase by signal. At day-light I weighed and stood into the Road, when the boats were dispatched, under the direction of Lieutenant Kersteman, assisted by Mr. Charles Sullivan, to attack and brig out the enemies vessels there; this service was completely effected in a manner highly creditable to the officers and men employed on it; the boats having taken possession of, and towed out from under a heavy fire from the batteries, an armed schooner of eight guns, and a large merchant brig. The early part of the morning had discovered to us two ships and a brig at anchor outside, and from one of them having the appearance of a ship of war, not a doubt was to be entertained of their being enemies. To be ready to take advantage of the first setting in of the sea breeze, the captured vessels were destroyed, and before noon his Majesty's ship was clear of the harbour in chase of the enemy, whose vessels had weighed and stood to sea.

I soon had the satisfaction of finding that the good sailing of his Majesty's ship afforded me a fair prospect of closing with the ship of war; and at half past three, finding us fast coming up with them, they all bore up, and ran on shore about nine miles to the westward of Samarary, opening, at the same time, a well-directed fire on us, which, on our anchoring in three fathoms water, was very smartly returned, though apparently without much success: the shoal water prevented my closing as near as I wished. In a few minutes the armed ship struck; and at half past four, p. m. as I was preparing to hoist the boats out with an intention to attempt taking possession by boarding, the ship of war surrendered; the brig shortly afterwards fired a broadside and hauled down her colours. On being boarded, they proved to be the Resolute armed merchant ship, of 700 tons, with a valuable cargo, having on board the colours and staff of the 23d European battalion in the Dutch service, the Ceres, a remarkably fine brig, in the Dutch Company's service, of twelve guns and seventy men, a month from Batavia, under the convoy of the Scipio corvette, of twenty-four guns and one hundred and fifty men; the latter had sustained considerable damage, many shot having passed through the hull, her rigging much cut, and her commander, Mons. Garrege, mortally wounded.

I am happy to add, that they were all got afloat the same night, without injury, by the persevering activity of my officers and men.

On the 1st the Caroline not having joined, and the ship's company considerably reduced by the absence of three officers and fifty men in prizes, I was induced to accede to a proposal made by the Governor of Samarary for allowing the prisoners to go on shore, the officers signing their parole, and proper receipts given for the soldiers and seamen.

I cannot too highly praise the zeal and activity displayed by the officers and men I have the honour to command on the whole of this service, and I regret that the force of the enemy did not afford a fuller scope to their exertions.

I have the honour to be, &c.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

Mr. Ross is returned from America. The Statira frigate landed him at twelve o'clock on Friday at Lymington. He proceeded to town immediately, and arrived at Mr. CANNING's Office late at night. He left the Chesapeake on the 31st of March, so that his passage must have been very expeditious. It was yesterday evening universally believed that the affair of the Chesapeake has been adjusted. The embargo in America, it is stated, will still continue: however, the American Government, we are informed, have declared to Mr. ROSE, that its continuance must not be attributed to any particular hostility which America feels toward this country, but is simply the result of the circumstances in which Europe at large is at present situated.

For our own part, we rejoice in every event that can be productive of peace in every quarter of the globe. The present Administration, we think, are not men likely to have made a dishonourable adjustment of their country's differences with any nation: and after the long course of devastation that now has for so many years been sweeping before our eyes, there can be but few persons whose hearts are not sickened with the very name of bloodshed. There are some points which still remain to be adjusted with America: but the Americans, we believe, are not likely to shew so much irritation on those subjects as they expressed themselves to feel in the affair of the Chesapeake.

THE NEW EXPEDITION.

The first division of the Expedition will sail the beginning or middle of next week; the flat-bottomed boats which have been ordered, to the number of one hundred and twenty, will be completed immediately, and put on board the men of war in the Downs.—The transports, on board of which the troops are to be embarked, arrived in the Downs on Saturday morning.---None of the regiments have yet embarked, but the embarkation is expected to commence on Monday at latest. The British troops will probably be embarked first. The 52d regiment, at present at Canterbury, received orders on Thursday to be in readiness to march at a few hours notice to the coast for embarkation. The second battalion of the 78th, now at Canterbury, was ordered to march to Chichester, to make room for the 20th, which was expected from Brabourne Lees; but the march of this battalion has been countermanded, and hence it is supposed that it is destined for foreign service. The infantry of the line in the Canterbury district consists at present of about 16,000 men, the major part of whom are to be embarked. The German Legion is on its march from Bexhill, Battle, and Hastings—but none of the battalions, we believe, have yet reached the coast. The whole will be embarked by the 28th or 29th.

2d Light Infantry of the German Legion will embark on the 24th instant.
1st Ditto, Ditto, the 25th instant
1st Regiment of the Line German Infantry, the 26th.
2d Ditto, Ditto, the 27th.
5th Ditto, Ditto, the 28th.
7th Ditto, Ditto, the 29th instant.

The transports for the reception of the troops that are to embark at Harwich arrived there on Thursday. The troops are to consist of British and Germans.

Thirty sail of transports for troops sailed on Friday evening from Portsmouth for the Downs.

A great number of conjectures have been formed with regard to the probable object of these expeditions. We shall mention the most remarkable among them, without presuming to give a direct opinion upon a question which it must be impossible for us to determine.—It has been supposed that we are sending troops to co-operate with those of Sweden in wresting Norway from the Danes: which would indemnify his Swedish Majesty for the loss of Finland. Russia, having no naval superiority, would scarcely send an army across the Gulph of Bothnia: and she will hardly venture by land round the northern extremity of the Gulph to the western side of it. The Norwegians seem to have little reason for feeling any satisfaction in the treatment they have met with from the Danish Monarchs.—Again: Cronstadt or Revel may perhaps be the object. In the Swedish Papers of late, the King very intelligibly intimated, that an English fleet would soon threaten the coasts of Russia, and probably attack the Russian fleet in its harbour of Cronstadt. This attack might impede the offensive measures of the Russian Emperor in Finland.—There is a third object, which our ministers may have in view. It might be of importance from commercial intentions, as well as for the operations of our fleets and armies, to seize a good post among the islands of the Baltic. Bornholm has been mentioned as a particularly desirable possession: for our seizure of that place might not only assist ourselves by furnishing a depôt, but directly embarrass the enemy, by depriving him of a shelter for his privateers, and leaving the sea open to our fleets. We confess that the quiet nature of the object last-mentioned seems to us little congenial with the dashing temper of our present ministers.

The advices from Sweden, which we have inserted in another part of our Paper, contain accounts of some skirmishes between the Swedes and Russians, but none of them have been important. The arrival of succours from England have inspired the Swedes with general satisfaction. We have inserted also the Swedish Answer to the Danish Declaration. It is a spirited and apparently candid explanation of the King of Sweden's rights and motives; and seems sufficiently to expose the shallow pretences under which the Danes have sought to cover the obligation that compels them to hostility.

Of the Rochefort Squadron we can give to our Readers no positive intelligence. A vessel from Honduras brings word that this Squadron has not entered the Chesapeake; and it is said that Government now believe the vessels seen by the Mullett schooner, on the 7th March, to have been the fleet of Sir John Duckworth, which on Monday returned to Cawsand Bay. In our Nautical Intelligence we have given a circumstantial account of the Admiral's voyage.

The advices from the West Indies, which we have given in another part of our Paper, relate the capture of Marigalante, by a British force under Captain Selby. The French islands are represented to be in a state of security; and we are sorry to perceive that the privateers of the enemy appear to predominate: no fewer than twelve are mentioned as being on the cruize.

The attention of the public has lately been called to a a judgment pronounced in the Prize Court of Bombay, by Sir James Mackintosh. An American vessel, trading from Providence to the colonies of Mauritius, Batavia, and Manilla, had been captured by virtue of his Majesty's instructions of 1803, which direct the seizure of every neutral vessel trading directly between the colonies of the enemy and the neutral country to which such vessel may belong. Sir J. Mackintosh pronounced a judgment of restitution. The captors, he said, were justified in detaining this vessel, because in so doing they were acting in obedience to the instructions.

But though the officers in his Majesty's service were bound to obey these instructions, he did not conceive himself, sitting as a Judge of prize in a Court whose decisions were to be regulated by the law of nations, as bound and concluded by them. "He believed, indeed, that he was the first and only Judge who had ventured to pronounce such a doctrine. In every prize court, in every country, by all writers on the subject, and all administrators of the law, the instructions of the Sovereign were regarded as a law to the Judge. But he considered the Law of Nations as paramount to such instructions; and the King, as having indeed a right to dispence with such law, but not a right to extend it. As far, therefore, as any of his Majesty's instructions were a relaxation of the law of nations in favour of neutrals, he should consider himself bound by them; but if he saw in such instructions any attempt to extend the law to the prejudice of neutrals, he should not obey them, but regulate his decisions according to the known and recognized law of nations. In the present case, after great deliberation, and minute inquiry, he felt himself bound to say, that neither Batavia nor Manilla were such colonies as to render any trading thereto, by neutral nations in time of war, illegal: It is not their being called colonies that will render such a trading unlawful, notwithstanding the letter of the instructions of 1803; something farther is necessary, and that is, that the trade to and with these colonies was prohibited to such neutrals in time of peace.

Now, we are far from mentioning it as matter of reproach to Sir J. Macintosh, that on a question of the law of nations, he has differed from the statesmen of this country, whose notions on such subjects are a little lax; but we cannot help thinking, that it is the first duty of a Judge to obey the instructions of his Sovereign's laws, and, if such obedience be discordant from his own ideas of right, he seems to have no option but to resign his office.

A vessel is arrived at Dublin from Cadiz, which place she left the 28th of March, in consequence of a report that an embargo would be laid on all ships in that port in the course of that day. The Captain states, that the last advices from Madrid, of the 4th of the same month, purported, that from 40 to 50,000 French soldiers were already in the neighbourhood of that city; that there had been disturbances and tumultuous meetings of the people. The Prince of the Peace, he states, had been insulted by the populace, and had withdrawn himself; but tranquillity had been restored, without very serious events having taken place. The date of this intelligence is much earlier than that of the reported insurrection in Madrid, of which no confirmation has yet reached us.

An English merchant is arrived in town, who left Lisbon about seventeen days ago. He made his escape on board Sir C. Cotton's fleet, having previously obtained his passport as a Spaniard. He has brought the Price Current with him, both as to merchandize and provisions. Bread and flour, indeed, appear, from it to be as scarce as was represented; but mutton and beef are only about 4d. per pound, and in great plenty, as are all sorts of vegetables. Some classes of the inhabitants suffer distress, those especially who depended on the Court for their subsistence, and who have lost their employment in consequence of its emigration. The French, we are informed, with their characteristic activity, have proceeded in making great improvements in the city; more, indeed, than have been made for many years before. The Governor has ordered the cleansing and new paving of most of the streets which were before in very bad condition. Other changes, however, have been of a less grateful nature, and proceed from motives more doubtful. General Junot has ordered that the images should be melted down. A deputation of Friars waited on the General to procure a respite for a very large and favourite saint, which they begged leave to remove and preserve. His answer was—"If the statue is of wood, you may throw it into the Tagus; if brass, you may break it; but if it is silver, or gold, you must bring it to me, and I will melt it."

Our squadron in the Adriatic has experienced much kindness from the inhabitants of the Seven Islands, who have expressed their desire to co-operate with a British force in the expulsion of the French, who are not in sufficient numbers to sustain themselves against a very moderate British force. At Corfu they have only fifteen hundred men, at Zante only one hundred, and fifty at Aphalonia. This latter Island would be an acquisition of great value to us, as we might keep it with 500 men. The inhabitants, who have 340 vessels, are particularly attached to the English, and by no means partial to the French.

We have been informed that Christophe, one of the Emperors of Hayti, has appointed M. Peltier, the quondam Editor of L'Ambigu, to be his Imperial Ambassador at the Court of London, with a salary of three thousand a year. It is added, that the first remittance has already been received by his new Excellency in coffee. If this story be true, will our Government accept him?

Capt. Goodall, Admiral of Hayti, is arrived in London, and states, that the object of the expedition of which he had the command, was to destroy Petion's privateers, and to protect the British trade from insult, under the operation of this decree. This object was effected by the destruction of Petion's vessels in the manner already stated.

R. H. Kennedy, Esq. Deputy Commissary General, is appointed for the expedition to Sweden, who was out on the late expedition to the Baltic.

The body of the late Mr. Paull was removed from his house in Charles-street, at six o'clock on Thursday morning, and interred in St. James's-church-yard. The funeral was very private, and the body was deposited on the western side of the church-yard. It is said, that Mr. Paull lost 1600*l.* at the gaming table, on the night previous to his committing the rash act of suicide; 500*l.* of which was lent to him by a Marquis. The will of Mr. Paull has been found sealed up, and addressed to Mr. Wollesley, of Shropshire, who was one of his most particular friends. On the day after the suicide, four sealed packets from India were delivered at his house. It is supposed they contain pearls to a considerable amount.

A new Harlequinade and the Classic Story of Jason and Medea, brilliantly illustrated with dresses and scenery, is now performing with bursts of applause, at the New Theatre, in Catherine-street, Strand. The Proprietors have undertaken the task with considerable spirit, and have rendered the Theatre the most commodious place within the Liberties. The dresses are designed by Mr. Johnston, mechanist, late of the Theatre-Royal, Drury-Lane; the music by Mr. Corri. We sincerely hope their endeavours will meet with success.

CITY.

FESTIVITIES AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

On the return of the festival of Easter Monday, according to ancient custom, a splendid banquet was given by the Lord Mayor at the Mansion-house. Before dinner, Sir D. Baird and Sir S. Auchmuty were presented with the Swords voted to them by the Corporation of London, with the Freedom of the City; on which occasion the Chamberlain took the opportunity of complimenting them for their important services, and received a suitable answer from Sir D. Baird. All the principal apartments of this spacious residence of the Chief Magistrate were illuminated, as was the Egyptian Hall, with peculiar taste and splendour. In that grand banquetting-room, the columns and pilasters were decorated with lamps to the lofty summit of their capitals: at the top was the Imperial Crown of Great Britain, with the characters of G. R. and the legend, "May he long live!" On the opposite side were the initials G. P. W. with the Prince's Plume, and the insignia of the Most Noble Order of the Garter. Five tables were spread, under the direction of Messrs. Hoffman, with all the delicacies in season and out of season, and with every viand which refined taste and unbounded liberality could provide. We ought not to omit to notice a dish the most gratifying to the palate and pride of John Bull, the grand Baron of Beef, which was surmounted on a pedestal at the extremity of the apartment.

Among the company present were, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, Dukes of York and Cumberland, Duke of Montrose, the Portuguese, Swedish, and American Ambassadors, the Earl and Countess of Portsmouth, Lord and Lady Mulgrave, Earl Camden, the Lord Chancellor, the Bishop of Salisbury, Dean of Lincoln, Earl of Oxford, Lord Hawkesbury, Mr. Windham, and several other persons of distinction.

At ten o'clock the doors were thrown open for the reception of visitors to the Ball, and it was not until one o'clock that many of the equipages could procure access. The Ball was opened by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and Miss Ansley, to the admired air of Madame Catalani's Waltz. At about three o'clock in the morning, a considerable portion of the company had left the Mansion-house; but the amusements continued to a much late hour.

Tuesday the Bridewell and Christ's Hospital Boys, according to ancient custom, were admitted to the Mansion-House, to see the decorations in the Egyptian Hall for the Easter Dinner. They then walked through the Grand Saloon, with their beadles and nurses, where the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, and several Aldermen and City Officers were seated, with the Lady Mayoress, and a number of Ladies. Each of the boys received from his Lordship a sixpence or a shilling, according to their merit, with a bun and a glass of wine. After which his Lordship, the Sheriffs, &c. went in state to Christ's Hospital, where they heard a sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Dodd.

BREAD.—Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of bread to be continued at 11d. the quartern loaf of wheaten, and 9½d household.

THE LOCAL MILITIA BILL.

This Bill has just been printed.—The 1st enacting Clause empowers his Majesty to establish a Local Force for the defence of the Realm.—The second enacts, that the number of men enrolled under the Act shall not exceed such number as will, including the effective Yeomanry and Volunteers, amount to —— times (six times was the amount suggested by Lord Castlereagh) the Militia quotas of such counties.—The 3d, that the deficiencies in the effective Volunteers shall be supplied by the Militia under the Act.—The 4th, that the Counties may be divided into divisions in any case in which more than one regiment of Local Militia is ordered to be raised.—The 5th extends the powers of Militia Acts to this Act.—The 6th, that men to be raised under this act shall be balloted from persons between the ages of —— and ——, and returned on the lists now existing (from 18 to 35 years of age).—The 7th excuses persons of bodily inability.—The 8th that no articled clerk, or apprentice, nor any poor man who has more than one child born in wedlock, nor any person under the height of —— shall, by reason thereof, be exempt from being balloted and serving under this Act, though they may be exempt from serving in the Militia.—The 9th, that persons shall not be exempt by having found substitutes or paid fines in the Militia.—The 10th prescribes the form of oath to be taken.—The 11th imposes penalty on persons not appearing after being so balloted; the fine to be proportioned to the amount of the income; the payment of such fine to exempt such persons from being balloted for —— years.—The 12th enacts, that a person claiming exemption upon payment of the smaller fine, shall sign a declaration of the amount of his income.—The 13th, on engaging to serve without pay in Volunteer Corps, part of the fine to be remitted.—The 14th inflicts a penalty on such persons on being returned non-effective.—The 15th, persons refusing to swear that they have not insured against fine, to forfeit the amount.—The 16th, Quakers not to be enrolled, but to pay certain fines according to the property of such persons.—The 17th contains regulations respecting Volunteers enrolling themselves.—The 18th gives a bounty to persons enrolling themselves voluntarily.—The 19th, Volunteer Corps may transfer themselves into the Local Militia.—The 20th, Volunteers to swear that they have no other bounty.—The 21st, allowances for necessaries.—The 22d, persons serving to be entitled to such exemptions as the Volunteers now have.—The 23d, persons insuring for providing substitutes, or volunteers, subject to penalty.

The remaining clauses regulate the officering and training in their respective counties—the embodying and marching to any part of Great Britain in case of invasion. Fines to be levied in counties for men deficient.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

On Friday night was performed, for the first time, a Ballet d'action called Caractacus. A more uninteresting piece of splendour it has not for a long time been our misfortune to witness. The Dramatis Personæ were as follow :—

BRITONS.

Caractacus,.....M. D'Egville.
Ulwy,.....Mr. Robert.
Hengo,.....Miss C. Bristow.
Modred,.....Mr. Cooke.
Mador,.....Mr. Smith.
Isla,.....Miss Gayton.
Ethelinde,.....Mrs. Sharp.

ROMANS.

Cæsar,.....Mr. Cranfield.
Claudius,.....Mr. Fisher.
Drusus,.....Mr. Male.
Marcus,.....Mr. Laurent.

The time of the piece is the epoch of the Roman invasion of Britain. Modred, the high priest, and Mador, the chief of the bards, enter with their attendants, and in an impressive anthem announce a sacrifice. The stone altar is prepared, and Isla, the destined victim, is introduced. She is about to be immolated for the propitiation of the war deities, when Ulwy, her lover, enters to entreat her liberation: he is repulsed, and Caractacus, the chief, then appears, and saves her life.—Marcus, one of the Roman chiefs is taken prisoner, and brought into the strong place of the priests, but escapes by clambering along the boughs that overhang the spot of his confinement. Claudius, Drusus, and other Romans come to his release: a battle takes place between the Romans and Britons, in which the latter are defeated.—The Second Act represents the Britons dispersed, and Caractacus and his boy Hengo flying among the fastnesses. A Roman soldier shoots the child, and Caractacus kills the soldier with a fragment of the rock. The child dies, the Romans seize Caractacus, and carry him with Ethelinde and others of the Britons, in triumph to Rome.—In the Third Act, after much of procession, the Roman generals bring Caractacus before the throne of Claudius Cæsar the Emperor: who, as far as we could understand, appeared to extend his mercy to the conquered chief, and to unite him to Ethelinde.

From this plot our readers will perceive that little could be expected—and accordingly little has resulted. The total absence of dramatic incident (except in the single instance of the shooting of the child, which was not very effective, and which is borrowed from Beaumont and Fletcher's Play of Bonduca), is a fault against which no magnificence of scenery, no pomp of procession, can successfully struggle. The affairs of a nation will never interest upon the stage: it is the personal adventure or distress of some prominent individual or individuals that excites the sympathy of an audience. So the misfortunes of Ugolino and his sons who were starved to death in prison, fill our minds with pity and with horror; but the history of a blockaded town where famine carries off whole hundreds in a day, is read almost without emotion: for our minds have not an infinitely extensive faculty of pitying, and the interest is dissolved in the generalization. Now in this ballet Caractacus ought to be the interesting personage; but Caractacus does nothing to excite our interest. He fights with his countrymen for his country, but that has nothing in it remarkable. He rescues a victim from death, but he rescues her without incurring any difficulties. He kills the murderer of his child; but he accomplishes that revenge without danger to himself. The only interest then must be the interest for the Britons: but we have said that the misfortunes of a nation are not the subjects of a dramatic interest, or indeed of any lively interest at all. And if they were, we should regret to see such a spring of interest touched at a moment like the present; for though we abhor the wretched patriotism that effervesces in our scenic soldiers and sailors, yet we do not wish, by a representation of British discomfiture, to see the stage made the vehicle of reproach to our ancestors, or of discouragement to our cotemporaries.

The expence of this piece must have been enormous: but it seems to have been incurred with little judgment, except as far as concerns the music. The music has a character of simplicity and grandeur, which produced a great effect upon the audience, and which reflects high honour on the genius of Mr. Bishop, the composer. The overture was particularly striking, and seems to have been conceived with a noble disdain of all the pantomime trickery of triangles and jig tunes.

There was great opposition at the announciation of the Piece for a second performance.

COVENT-GARDEN.

At this Theatre Shakespeare's Comedy of The Two Gentlemen of Verona has been revived with great expence. The play is thus represented :—

Duke of Milan,.....Mr. Murray.
Valentine,.....Mr. Kemble.
Protheus,.....Mr. Pope.
Anthonio,.....Mr. Cresswell.
Thurio,.....Mr. Liston.
Eglamour,.....Mr. Claremont.
Speed,.....Mr. Blanchard.
Launce,.....Mr. Munden.
Julia,.....Miss Smith.
Silvia,.....Miss Norton.
Lucetta,.....Miss Waddy.

Protheus loves Julia, a lady of Verona, and sends her a letter by her maid Lucetta. After seeming coyness, she returns his passion, but their loves are interrupted by the command of Anthonio, Protheus's father, who forces his son to travel, and join young Valentine, at Milan. Valentine, at Milan, falls in love with Silvia, the Duke's daughter, to whom he introduces his friend Protheus; Protheus seeing her, becomes inconstant to Julia. Valentine confides to Protheus his intention of stealing away by night his beloved Silvia, who is to descend from her window by a ladder of ropes; and the false Protheus, in jealousy, betrays the plot to the Duke. Valentine is discovered, and banished from Milan: he falls among the outlaws, is chosen their Captain, and dwells in the woods, attended by his servant Speed. Julia, unknowing of Protheus's inconstancy, assumes male attire, and follows him to Milan, where she finds him with Thurio, a conceited suitor of Silvia, serenading her at the palace window. She engages herself as his page, and is even sent by him to request Silvia's picture, which she obtains. Silvia, harrassed by her father, who would persuade her to marry Thusio, flies under the protection of Eglamour in search of Valentine. The Duke and his attendants, Thurio and Protheus with his servants Launce and Julia, pursue the fugitives. Silvia and Eglamour are seized by the outlaws in the wood, and Silvia is rescued by Protheus, who sues for her favour in return of his service. This interview takes place in the wood within hearing of Valentine, who rushes forward, and reproaches Protheus with his perfidy. Protheus repents, and Valentine restores him to his friendship. Julia discovers herself, and once more becomes dear to her reformed lover. The Duke is brought in by the outlaws; he is pleased with the generous spirit of Valentine, unites him to Silvia, and pardons the free-booters. Scattered through the play are scenes of low comic dialogue between the servants Launce and Speed.

This play, if it had not been published with the name of Shakespeare, would probably never have been known to any body but the commentators on the old dramas. There is an incident in the third act: Valentine's rope-ladder is taken from his cloak by the Duke—and there is a situation in the fifth: Valentine discovers Protheus wooing Silvia—but we can see nothing else in the whole Play deserving any praise for dramatic construction; and even the detection of the rope-ladder, though naturally managed, produces little effect. Indeed the earlier half of the Play is one of the dullest exhibitions that ever an audience tolerated: the fourth act is better, and the last scene in the fifth act is decidedly good: but all this, at best, can only make The Two Gentlemen of Verona a strong half-price Play. Nor is the absence of incident and interest compensated by much poetical beauty in the dialogue: there are two or three fine touches of nature, but they are too fine for for common spectators, and will hardly make the revival answer to the Theatre. Among these are the soliloquy of Julia on receiving Protheus's loving letter: and Julia's comparison of herself with the picture of Silvia.

The revival of the good plays of our good authors is always to be encouraged and applauded; but this play seems to have been received, not because it was a good play, but because it was the play of a good author. We shall always extol the medical power that can raise from the torpor of numbing oblivion those forgotten works which still retain the sparks of life: but we cannot approve the galvanic vehemence that tortures unredeemable mortality, and forces corruption into notice.

Mr. Kemble performed Valentine with little effect in the earlier part of the play: but in the fifth act he blazed with all his wonted splendour. We are always sorry to see him representing a lover: strength, rather than tenderness, is the characteristic of his genius. His softness is always too hard, and his dejection too dignified, for the performance of amatory parts.

Digitized by Google

In his address to Thurio at the end of the play, where Valentine, though he does not cease to love, is certainly more a hero than a lover, Mr. Kemble electrified the audience: perhaps, indeed, there never was an actor so eminently gifted for the expression of rapid declamation and lofty passion. Mr. Pope did justice to the part of Protheus: Mr. Liston, throughout the conceited gentility of Thurio, was admirably humorous, and Mr. Munden was exceedingly natural and quaint in the little character of Launce. Miss Smith is entitled to high encomium as the representative of Julia: she seems determined to make the London public lament more than ever her transit to the Dublin boards. She is peculiarly excellent in the delineation of speechless grief and patient suffering. We cannot praise the Silvia of Miss Norton. She has not yet reformed her bad habit of bringing out her words by syllables, when she should speak them in sentences. Language ought to flow in a continued gush: not to distil like drops into a water-tub.

FINE ARTS.

SPRING EXHIBITIONS.

SOCIETY OF PAINTERS, OLD BOND-STREET.

It has been in all ages lamented that wit and genius, are too careless of the main chance; notwithstanding the general truth of this remark we must still acknowledge that pecuniary encouragement is a powerful stimulus even to the highest flights of genius herself; and although the early painters of the Italian school, on the revival of the art in the fourteenth century, may have been more strongly inspired by the enthusiasm of religion than by the hopes of gain, yet it is well known that the munificence of the Medici family in later ages, and the profusion of the tasty Burgomasters of Amsterdam and Brussels, operated more powerfully than even the superstition of the times in eliciting those sparks of the graphic fire, which will immortalize the pencils of a Salvator, a Lorraine, a Teniers, and a Rubens. Under this impression, we are happy to see so many exhibitions of the works of Modern Painters, where every amateur, however small his fortune, may become a Mæcenas on a small scale, and contribute his mite to the encouragement of native excellence. We shall now present our readers with a few notices of those most remarkable for merit, or which may seem to require the friendly hint of impartial criticism.

No. 13.—Mercury, Argus and Io. I. GLOVER.

In an age so classical as the present, 'tis unnecessary to call the attention of the fashionable world to the story itself particularly; but if a classic story is to be given, we feel a disappointment if there is any omission of those small traits which ought to mark it more strongly. Now, in this composition, it is unfortunate that the catalogue informs us who we are to expect to see in the wood, otherwise Argus with two eyes instead of an hundred, would not recall to our fancy the idea of the watchful Guardian, placed by the jealous Queen of the Heavens, over the gentle and too lovely Io, whom she had transformed into a heifer.—We mark the last word in italics, because the figure of Io in this piece is not a heifer but a cow, and so far inaccurate; indeed there is a tameness also in the animal which answers not our expectation, for however absurd the tale is to our reason, yet fancy pictures her to every schoolboy as the handsomest of all handsome heifers. There is a lightness and grace, however in the figure of Mercury, which with the pyramidal outline of the grouping, shews the pencil of an artist capable of greater things. The landscape is but a secondary object in the piece, yet we cannot help noticing that there is a broad glaring sameness of tint, diffused over it which is by no means productive of effect, and the mass of buildings in the distance, are more like ruins from Lorraine, than the architecture of the age in which Miss Io, met with her transformation.

No. 87.—The Airy Hall of Fingal. S. RIGAUD.

In this composition there is a good effect produced from the contrast between the bright glow surrounding Malvina, and that darkness visible which marks the presence of the spirits of her ancestors, whose forms are pourtrayed by that kind of palpable obscurity, which shews them rather by an absence of light than by any relief arising from the tinting of a shade, or the sketching of an outline. Yet though pleased with the execution of this work, we feel rather disappointed in the appropriation of the idea to the subject; we see nothing of the Airy Hall, 'tis all a mass of clouds, in which Malvina rises like Peters's departed child ascending to judgment, and from the dark fiend in one corner reposing on the bosom of night, a spectator at a casual glance, would be tempted to expect a Pandemonium rather than the embodying of one of the sublimest ideas of Ossian.

No. 50.—Scene near Calshot Castle. W. S. GILPIN.

Below this glowing landscape is very injudiciously placed No. 50, which acts, indeed, as a contrast, but much to its own disadvantage. There is a coldness thrown over the whole production, arising not only from the stiffness of outline, but also from the tints necessary to represent the walls of Calshot, and the stone facings of its counterscarp, which are but faintly relieved by the thinness of the verdure spread along its shingly beach; if the earth, however, presented but little for a glowing pencil, yet the air may be more easily reduced under the command of the painter's magic, nor was it necessary that such frigidity of colouring, such a bleak uninteresting stone tint, should be thrown over the smiling face of day. Mr. Gilpin, however, makes amends for this in 303, a scene near Beaulieu, in the New Forest: Shakespeare's all-creative fancy could not have given a richer foliage to his Forest of Arden: the Spectator seems wrapped up in all the gloom and obscurity of the Woodland Dell, and forgets, for a moment, the gay scene with which he is surrounded.

EXHIBITION OF ASSOCIATED ARTISTS,

BROOK-STREET.

The encreasing number of Candidates for Graphic Fame has rendered it impossible for the walls of Somerset-house to contain even all the chefs d'œuvres of the art which might be offered to the acceptance of the Hanging Committee. In that case, the works of minor artists, and of young candidates just starting for the goal of immortality, would be thrown on the shelf of oblivion, were it not for these assistant exhibitions, which not only expose them for public view, but also present them to the fostering patronage of public liberality. It is not to be supposed that these minor exhibitions can contain many works of sterling merit; we are tempted, however, to steal a corner, from more serious subjects, just to notice a few which more strongly claim attention.

We mean not to accuse the Regulators of the Exhibition at the Academy of giving a preference to masculine works; but at the same time, every one will acknowledge, that the efforts of the female pencil stand the best chance for admission at these less dignified receptacles of the art. We shall therefore give precedence to the Ladies; amongst whom we are happy, first, to notice that deserving artist, Miss Emma Smith.

No. 55. The Princess and the Slave.... E. SMITH.

This easy and natural, yet finished groupe, is taken from one of Lewis's Tales of Wonder, where the female slave offers the drinking bowl to the aged matron, whilst the Princess lays by her side asleep. We call it a finished groupe, from the spirit and correctness of the outline, though the general shading is merely washed in in large masses, though with a degree of spirit and accuracy which mark a pencil accustomed to more laboured performances.

No. 247, by the same artist, is a good likeness of Miss Duncan, as Lady Teazle, and is not only worthy of notice, from its good likeness to the original, but also from that characteristic archness which, though so fleeting and versatile in the original, is here happily caught, and transfused upon the ivory.

250. A Head of Christ, after GUIDO, and 218, a Magdalen, after the same Master, are both excellent in themselves, and though copies, have all the force and spirit of originals; there is all that vivid colouring of the Bolognese School, which rivals the enamel in its brilliancy, whilst the chastity in contrasting these bright tints, prevents any inharmonious glare, and assimilates them, to the divine fortitude of the one, and the mild resignation of the other.

There are a number from the pencil of Mr. Green, but we are best pleased with those, which shew he is not ashamed to take hints from "the Antique," on which, however, he has the singular merit of improving. We allude to 93, a Sea Nymph, taken from one of the Paintings, preserved in the Ruins of Herculaneum in fresco, of a Venus, floating in a cockle shell, which shell, however, Mr. GREEN has changed into a Dolphin, and has certainly not lessened the effect; we also observe that his very elegant work of the "Market of Love," owes its origin to the same source, but may be reckoned a chef d'œuvre of the fanciful, and is infinitely superior to the original sketch, both in the grouping of the Nymphs, the Loves, and Doves, and in that playful kind of action in which every figure is engaged; this Piece does not as yet seem much noticed, but we are convinced that it must rise in public estimation, the longer it is exhibited.

EASTER MONDAY.

On this long wished for day of annual fun and frolic, the civic Sportsmen were placed like Capt. Macheath, between Lucy and Polly, having no less than two Easter Hunts, at which to sport their dashing Rosinantes—Epping, and Windsor Forests.

The roads leading eastward from the Metropolis, were crowded at an early hour, with every thing that could carry a saddle, hacks, ponies, cart-horses, and donkies, with a plentiful sprinkling of the wheeled creation, gigs, whiskies, and tumbledowns, all crowded, with the beauty and fashion of Moorfields, Bricklane, and Puddledock, anxious to see as how Master Bobby could ride, and be in at the death. This motley groupe being assembled at the Baldfaced Stag, the customary libations to the Goddess of the chace, and to the healths of the Goddesses, who had arrived to witness the sport of the day, were poured out under the auspices of the High Priest of fun, the jolly Landlord. The Saffron Walden hounds, which had been procured for the occasion, and a Stag also, which had been thought necessary for a hunt, were soon in waiting at Fair Maid's Bottom ; every necessary precaution was then taken of girthing saddles on, &c. &c. and happy would it have been for many a luckless wight, if the riders had been girthed on also. The Stag was now turned out, but though there were many Attorney's Clerks in the groupe, he was allowed but little law, when the whole cavalcade in one general burst, pressed on upon his haunches.

The Stag, as if conscious that the best road for his pursuers, was the road to town, pushed on for Chigwell-row, and after a run of fifty minutes, took soil in a pond in that neighbourhood, when one of his gay followers, better mounted than their companions, had nearly completed their literal boast, of being in at the death. The animal was now caught and reserved for another occasion, whilst the jocund throng hastened to quarter themselves at the different public houses on the Forest, in order to hunt the Stag over again, and to learn some particulars of the chace, such as the time when, the place where, &c. &c. for few had been able to proceed as fast as their horses; indeed, lamented would have been the fate of many an Absalom, had not the Brutus top saved them, from the danger of riding through a forest with a long head—of hair.

The Windsor Hunt, from its extreme distance from town, could boast of but few metropolitan Actæons, and of the few who came, their cattle were too much fatigued to start from Swinley Lodge, where a numerous party were regaled by Marquis Cornwallis. At ten, a stag was turned out at Tower-hill, on Bagshot-heath, to a field of 300: he made a sharp burst, passed the Golden Farmer, doubled towards Cobham, pushed through the inclosures of Bagshot, where few could follow him, and was taken after a run of an hour and a half. But, if the sporting Cocknies found it difficult to catch the stag, some of them also found it difficult to catch their horses, which, released from their riders, were prancing over the field in all directions, adding a list of missing to that of the wounded.

A third hunt was got up, by some of the knowing ones left in town, and who, hearing of a stag to be turned out on Tower-hill, very prudently engaged seats at their friends windows, in the Minories, Lower Thames-street, and Rosemary-lane. Having waited patiently for some hours, the usual attack commenced on the cold ham, cake, &c. and they returned contentedly to their respective homes, having seen as much of the hunt as those who had rode farther.

The other entertainments of the season were repeated with universal applause—Dust carts, and all other carts, were gaily splashing and jostling on the Greenwich-road—gin and gingerbread, fun and frolic, were the order of the day ; and many a well-turned ancle was displayed to the eager gaze of the spectators at the foot of the hill, whilst many of the fair performers, we have no doubt, will have reason to remember Easter Monday !

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

Upon the subject of Sir John Duckworth's late cruize, we have been favoured with the following interesting extract of a letter from an Officer belonging to the Squadron, dated " Cawsand Bay, (Plymouth), April 18.

" Having run down the Bay of Biscay, and called off Capes Ortegal and Finisterre, and Lisbon, we arrived off Madeira, and found Sir Samuel Hood lying in Funchall Roads, where we remained for two days. On the morning of the 3d of February, his Majesty's ship Comus, gave us intelligence of her having been chased two days before to the N. W. of Madeira, and it then became obvious that the destination of the French squadron was the West Indies, for which we proceeded with all expedition, and made the Island of St. Lucia and Martinique in 21 days. Off the East End of Martinique we saw six sail of the line ; we cleared for action, and formed the line of battle, but, on exchanging signals, we found friends instead of enemies—it was Sir Alexander Cochrane, with his squadron, who was waiting to give that enemy a reception which we were in chace of, conceiving that he would take refuge in that port. Finding that his fleet was sufficient to cope with them in those seas, we passed all the Windward Islands, and anchored on the 16th of Feb. in Bassaterre Roads, St. Kitt's, where we remained only eighteen hours, just long enough to take in water, but no provisions, nor even linen washed. We then proceeded to St. Domingo, where it was supposed the enemy had proceeded for the purpose of landing troops; but on our arrival there we found no ships.—After cruizing in the Mona Passage for seven or eight days, we made all dispatch for the coast of America, and arrived off the Chesapeake on the 11th of March. We communicated with the Statira frigate, and found that our Ambassador, Mr. Rose, was at Washington for the last time, to determine whether it should be peace or war with England. We should have gone in, but the Yankies would not let us have a pilot, nor supply us with water or provisions, which forced us to be content to live upon half our usual allowance; they would not give us a single pint of water or a cabbage stock. We left the Eurydice, to bring us any intelligence that might occur as to peace or war with America, and quitted the hospitable shores of America for the Western Islands, where we procured all we wanted, after a very long and a very anxious cruise. The Governor of Flores (a Portuguese), came off to us, but not being able to give us any information, the Admiral thought it most expedient to proceed for England, where we arrived this morning, after having been upwards of three months at sea, and made a complete circuit of the Western and Atlantic Ocean, a journey of upwards of thirteen thousand miles."

By some of our cruizers from off the coast of France, we learn, that within the last fortnight, two more sail of the line have been added to a strong force assembled in the outer harbour of Brest, which seems in a complete condition for sea, and ready for a start the first fair wind, or any such as may oblige our blockading fleet to quit its station.

PORTSMOUTH, APRIL 22.—Arrived this day the Statira frigate, Captain Bromley, with Mr. Rose, the English Envoy Extraordinary to the Government of the United States, from North America.—This gentleman landed at Lymington this afternoon. Also arrived the Satyr, Johns, from St. Domingo; parted company with the Betsey Sophia, Shaw, from Surinam, off Scilly, on the 19th inst.

POLICE.

PUBLIC-OFFICE, ROW-STREET.

On Monday a young man went to the Cecil-street Coffee-house, in the Strand, dined, and drank a bottle of wine, and in payment gave the waiter a counterfeit 10*l.* Bank note. Mr. Cox, the landlord, desired the waiter to ask for a smaller note, when he replied he had none. Mr. Cox then sent a porter to Mr. Burnell's, a grocer in the Strand, who discovered it to answer the description of one that had been traced to him by the Inspector of the Bank, a few hours before, and which had been altered from a 1*l.* to a 10*l.* This circumstance he communicated to Mr. Cox, and pointed out to him the alterations which had been made. They then informed the gentleman of the fact, and proposed that they should go before the Magistrates at Bow-street, to which he observed, that he had an appointment, which he wished to keep, and promised to meet them there, after he had attended to it. Mr. Cox, however, urged him to go then, at which he appeared displeased, but at length went. On the charge being made known, Anthony searched him, and found a pocket-book, containing a five, a two, and a one pound Bank notes, with three seven-shilling pieces. While Anthony was searching him, he appeared to have an impediment in his speech, and the officer desired him to open his mouth, which he refused to do, on which Anthony seized him by the wind-pipe, forced him to open his mouth, and took from it a parcel of paper, which proved to be four notes of a similar description to that he had offered to Mr. Cox, but in an unfinished state. He then underwent an examination before Mr. Read, and the note which he uttered was produced: it had been cut in two through the word "one," at the top of the note, and joined together by a thick piece of paper, and three wafers—one of them was put on the part where the word "one" was at the top of the note, to prevent any obliteration of the word. The Inspector of the Bank called upon Anthony on Monday, to give him information of the note traced to Mr. Burnell, and described the man who was supposed to be uttering them. Anthony finding the prisoner to answer the description given by the Inspector, was the cause of his searching him in such a particular manner.—Mr. Read asked the prisoner what he had to say for himself? He said his name was Richard Holmes—but declined saying what he was, where he lived, or making any defence to the charge—but offered to find unexceptionable bail to any amount, which of course could not be taken, and, upon a re-examination, he was fully committed for trial.—It is suspected that he has not given his real name, and that he is of a respectable family.

MANIACS.

Windsor Castle has lately been much infested with Maniacs. A genteel man, who has every appearance of an Officer, and also a woman, have been using various stratagems to get into the Palace, to gain admittance to His Majesty, under pretence of their having business with him.

Mr. Read, the Magistrate, being informed of the circumstance, sent directions to the resident Police Officers at Windsor, to apprehend the Officer; Edwards accordingly went to the Windsor Castle Inn, on Tuesday last, where the person described was living in grand style, and apprehended him. He was brought to London, and underwent examination; he was ordered to be kept at the Brown Bear public-house, Bow-street, until it can be ascertained who he is, as he refuses to give any other account of himself than that his name is Howe. The woman has been about Windsor for some time past, and has made many efforts to get into the Palace, but being disappointed, she went to Cumberland Lodge, in the Park, and there contrived to gain admittance, a few mornings since, and concealed herself in the coachman's room. It not being customary for him to lock his door, she entered while he was asleep, but was discovered, and taken into custody. She underwent an examination before General Harcourt, who ordered her to be confined in Windsor Gaol.

SUICIDES.

The month of April has proved more fatal than any other month within our recollection. No less than four persons put an end to their existence last week at Deptford, one of them the wife of a publican, cut her throat; and on Tuesday morning a respectable tradesman on Holborn-bridge shot himself.

Sunday morning last the inhabitants of Islington were much agitated, in consequence of the body of a respectable-looking man being found in the fields, near Copenhagen-house, supposed to be murdered. The deceased was conveyed to Islington Church-yard to be owned, and the Parish Officers were exerting themselves to find out the murder; but, on examining the spot where the unfortunate man was found, as well as the field adjoining, they had every reason to suppose that he had inflicted the mortal wound in his throat, with a knife, which was found near him, and that he got over a bank and stile into the next field, where, from the loss of blood, he fell and expired. About noon the body was owned, and the deceased proves to be Mr. Monicke, a furrier, in a respectable line of business in the city, who, we understand, had unsuccessfully applied to some of his creditors for pecuniary indulgence. A Coroner's Inquest was held on the body on Wednesday last, when the evidence tended to corroborate, that the deceased had died by his own hands, labouring under Lunacy.

Stephen Bailey, of Higham, on returning home from labour last week, found his wife suspended from an iron hook over the fire; all her clothes were in a blaze, and she burnt in a most shocking manner. He had given her money to pay some debts in the place, which having applied to other purposes, she took the fatal resolution of destroying herself in this dreadful manner.

A foreigner who has resided in this country many years, and who had acquired considerable reputation as an artist, yesterday put a period to his existence by shooting himself with a horse pistol. The ball entered his left ear, and passed through the top part of the head, which, however, did not cause immediate death—he languished more than half an hour after having committed the rash act.

Tuesday a servant maid in St. James's Park, entrusted with the care of two children, incautiously suffered a little boy to ride upon the back of one of the seats, when a cloud of dust suddenly blowing in the child's face, he loosed his hold to rub his eyes, and falling backwards, pitched upon his head, and fractured his skull. This is a very common way of amusing children in the Park, and it is to be hoped the above accident will prevent it in future.

PICKPOCKETS.—On Saturday se'nnight, about 12 o'clock, as Lieut. Kelly, of his Majesty's ship the Triumph, was passing along Holborn, he was surrounded by one of those daring gangs of pickpockets, who still infest the streets of Loudon, and robbed him of his pocket-book, containing Bank Notes to the amount of 450*l.* and naval papers of considerable importance. It is supposed the villains effected the robbery in the following manner:—One of them trod upon his heel, and on his turning about, appeared very politely to beg his pardon; while this pretended apology was making, it caused Lieut. Kelly to stop a little, and he found himself surrounded by four or five men, and soon after missed his pocket-book. The papers it contained consisted of the testimonials from the different Admirals he had served under, letters of recommendation, his commission, and other papers of importance. He has been in a very low desponding way ever since, in consequence of the robbery.

BIRTHS.

In Welbeck-street, the Lady of Roger Kynaston, Esq. of a son.

Berkeley-square, the Lady of T. B. Lethbridge, Esq. M. P. of a daughter.

MARRIED.

On Tuesday, the 19th inst. at Aske, in Yorkshire, the Rev. William Wharton, to the Hon. Miss Dundas, daughter of Lord Dundas.

On the 16th instant, at Kneesworth Hall, the seat of Sir Charles Nightingale, Bart. James Murkland, Esq. of the 63d Regiment, to Miss Nightingale, eldest daughter of the late Sir Edward Nightingale, Bart.

DIED.

On Friday evening, in the 80th year of his age, the respectable Mr. Hull, late of Covent-Garden Theatre. He was the Father of the Stage, and the founder of that institution which provides subsistence for decayed Actors and Actresses. The Principals of the Theatrical Fund, we understand, have requested permission to bear the expences of his funeral.

At Stonehouse, Miss Isabella Langton, daughter of the Countess of Rothes.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER EIGHTEEN.

ON "THE BILL FOR BETTERING THE CONDITION OF STIPENDIARY CURATES."

The condition of the inferior Clergy in this kingdom has long been matter of lamentation with rational and equitable men: but except the donation which was made by Queen Anne, of certain revenues resulting to the Crown from rich benefices, (a donation commonly known by the name of Queen Anne's Bounty,) nothing material has hitherto been effected for the amelioration of their circumstances. A Bill is at length however pending in the House of Commons, from which some benefit is undoubtedly to be expected: and although we are not of opinion that it remedies, in one tenth part, the grievances which are allowed to exist, yet we are glad to catch at a little benefit in the absence of complete alleviation, and we hail this Bill with the more satisfaction, because it does not appear to preclude the possibility of further reformation.

This Bill enacts, that in all cases where a spiritual person shall be non-resident for more than three months together, or four months at several times in one year, it shall be lawful for the Bishop to assign to the Curate a salary, which, with his former stipend, shall not exceed one-fifth of the usual value of the benefice, if that value shall exceed four hundred pounds clear of all expences but the payment of the Curate; and if the spiritual person shall have omitted to nominate a Curate, and shall neglect to do so after monition from the Bishop, the Bishop may appoint a Curate, with such salary as aforesaid, and may assign a residence in the Parsonage house, or an allowance not exceeding thirty pounds in lieu thereof—Provided nevertheless that in no case the salary shall exceed 250*l. per annum*, unless with consent of the incumbent, who shall have the power of returning to his residence at any time giving six months notice. The Bishop's authority is to be exercised in a summary way, and comprises powers of revocation: and from the Bishop there is an appeal to the Archbishop both for the Incumbent, and for the Curate, the appellant giving security for costs. Spiritual persons, in every nomination of a Curate, are to state the annual sum agreed to be allowed, and the annual value of the benefice: and all agreements whereby a Curate may undertake to accept less than the Bishop or Archbishop is enabled to grant, or than shall be stated in the nomination, shall be void, and the Curate shall be entitled in law to recover the remainder.

It will be easily seen that the number of persons who can be benefitted by this Bill must be very small indeed. For it makes no provision for any but Curates, and the provision that it makes for Curates is a provision only for the Curates of benefices worth more than 400*l.* a-year. Now the number of benefices worth more than 400*l.* a-year is very small in proportion to the number of benefices of all kinds existing in this country. It has been computed (and for the arithmetical statements in detail we refer our readers to Burn's Ecclesiastical Law), that of our 10,000 parishes upwards of five thousand furnish less than 50*l.* a-year to the incumbents of their respective benefices. What must be the number then of livings amounting in value to 400*l.* a-year, which is the sum specified in the pending Bill, our readers will easily guess. We have not been able to ascertain the precise number of such livings; but when we observe that more than half the benefices of the country are of an annual value under 50*l.* and when we consider that, of the richer livings, a very large proportion is in the hands of lay proprietors, for whose Vicars or Curates no provision is pointed out by this act, we cannot but fear that few, very few persons, will be materially benefited by the measure. With regard to the exclusion of lay appropriators and their Vicars from the operations of this measure, we by no means approve the present Bill: for though we should think it unjust to blame the Chancellor of the Exchequer who introduced this Bill, for not having introduced a Bill that might thoroughly reform the Church, yet when we see him proposing a measure for the remedy of grievances which oppress two classes of people, namely, the Curates of the Clergy, and the Curates or Vicars of Laymen, and see that the measure proposed does in fact remedy the grievance only inasmuch as relates to one of those classes, namely the Curates of the Clergy, leaving the Curates and Vicars of Laymen to complain of the unjust partiality by which they are excluded—then we do feel it our duty to vindicate the rights of the excluded class, and to represent the necessity of extending to them the privileges that are to be extended to their brethren.

Perhaps it may be urged, that the Curates or Vicars of the laity can have no right to complain, because the certain permanency of their cures, which belong to them for life, has placed them already in a better situation than the removeable Curates, for whose benefit this Bill is intended. But if we consider the principle of the Bill, we shall find that this is no answer at all to our claim in favour of the omitted class. For the principle of this Bill evidently is, "That it is just and expedient that a portion of the large revenues paid by certain parishes for the support of their churches, shall be taken away from those who enjoy a revenue without performing the duty, in order to make a sufficient provision for the maintenance of those by whom the duties of such churches are actually performed." If this be the principle of the Bill, which we believe will hardly be denied, then we ask—Ought not the person performing the duties of a Church for a Lay Appropriator to be as sufficiently and respectably supported, as the person who performs the duties of the Church for a spiritual Parson? And that, whether his present insufficient maintenance be only temporary, or whether it be the stipend upon which he may linger out a miserable maintenance till death? Nor let it be objected that this argument would apply to all poor Rectors, and principals of livings, as well as to Curates and Vicars

Under the principle of the present Bill, this argument could not have such an application: for the principle of this Bill does not extend to the impoverishment of rich benefices for the supply of deficiencies in poor ones: it goes only to provide for the proper support of the Clergymen doing the actual duties of those churches that are already rich enough, by applying the riches of such churches to the reward of the persons who labour for them.

It is possible that the objection which has prevented the Chancellor of the Exchequer from extending the benefits of this Act to the Vicars and Curates of lay appropriators, may have arisen from the ecclesiastical constitution of the jurisdictions which had been selected by him to administer the Act: for we can hardly suppose that so considerate and sound a lawyer as Mr. Perceval, can have overlooked the existence of this class of clergymen. But we own that any such objection appears to us exceedingly insufficient. For if the jurisdiction by which Mr. Perceval had determined to administer this Act, was not equal to the accomplishment of all the purposes of that Act, he had better have fixed upon some other jurisdiction which would have been equal to the accomplishment of those purposes: but we do not comprehend, for our own parts, why the ecclesiastical nature of the jurisdiction now appointed should be any hindrance to the distribution of a just and expedient measure concerning the church. Shall it be said, that a lay appropriator would object, upon constitutional principles, to the jurisdiction of the Church over his property? We ask upon what constitutional principle the Church property is his? He will answer, by inheritance or by purchase. But then does not that property belong to him on the conditions which his inheritance or his purchase transmitted? It cannot be denied. The Statutes of 15th Richard II. and of 4th Henry IV. expressly enjoined that the Vicarages which were then the property of spiritual appropriators, should be sufficiently endowed: on the conditions of these statutes, persons were permitted to hold the lands of the Church: and the former of them gave to the Diocesan Bishop the power of interfering to distribute a competent sum annually among the poor parishioners. Here then we find that these lands were declared subject to the performance of the Church duties, and that the Bishop was empowered to exercise an authority concerning them.

At the dissolution of the monasteries in the reign of Henry the Eighth, the appropriations of the parsonages which belonged to them, amounting to more than one third of all the parishes in England, would have been by the common law disappropriated: had not clauses intervened in the statutes of 27 and 31 Henry VIII. to give them to the King in as ample manner as the Abbots and other heads of religious houses had before held them. All these appropriations, as well as those of the alien priories, that had been dissolved and given to the Crown in former reigns, were afterwards granted out from time to time by the Kings; and such are the sources from which all the lay appropriations, or secular parsonages in the kingdom, have sprung.

But by the accession of these appropriations to the Crown, no alteration has certainly been made in the nature of the appropriations themselves: for they were given to the King in as ample a manner as his predecessors had possessed them, but not in a manner more ample. Still then the just claims of the Church were in force, when the King granted the parsonages to his favourites: still of course those favourites were bound to fulfil such claims; and this principle has even been virtually acknowledged by a subsequent statute passed 29 Car. II. which renders perpetual the temporary augmentations made by Appropriators to their Vicars and Curates.

Now, if according to the principles of these statutes, of justice, and of an expediency amounting almost to absolute necessity, a sufficient provision be proposed for these vicarages and curacies, which provision shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the Bishop, can it be said that the constitution is violated by taking the property of laymen out of their hands, and exposing them to the horrors of episcopal tyranny? We think no rational man, who reflects upon the monstrous anomaly which appears in the appropriation of Church property to lay Proprietors at best, who contemplates the legality and fitness of providing a sufficient endowment for the vicarages, who remembers that what was a sufficient endowment in former times is not a sufficient endowment now, who observes that the profits of these parsonages, though not in the hands of Churchmen, are yet extorted from the people only under pretence of supporting the Church, who considers that the parsonages themselves, having been originally subject to the Church in every way, ought still to be subject to its fair claims—under all these urgent reasons, we think no rational man could ever feel, that a Bishop, in interfering between the Vicar and the secular Parson, was trespassing beyond the limits of his ecclesiastical authority, or committing an innovation that could be dangerous to the constitutional liberties of the laity.

It has been further objected to this Bill, that an unfair partiality is shown to the richer Clergy, in limiting the allowance of the Curate to 250*l.* a year, even where the profits of the living amount to more than five times that sum. We refuse to allow this objection, not because we wish to see the overgrown affluence of the Clergy encouraged and aided, but because we think that an annual salary of 250*l.* appears to be an income quite sufficient for a mere Curate. Whether a Curate performing all the duties of a cure so large as to exceed in value 1250*l.* a year, ought not to be the incumbent of that cure, that is in short, whether there ought, except in very few cases, to be any such things as curacies at all, is not the question now before us. If the present system of the Church be the system which is to continue, then it does not seem fitting that Curates should have salaries so large as to exceed 250*l.* a year, which for a single man is certainly more than a sufficient maintenance, while the incumbents themselves of half our livings gain less than fifty pounds a year. For married men 250*l.* a year may be, and certainly is, insufficient; but a prudent man, having no dependence but a curacy, ought not to marry: for the revenues of a Church, though they ought to be employed in respectably maintaining the officiating Ministers of that Church, yet are not designed by the State as encouragements to population.

That the Bill is not imperative upon the Bishops, appears to us a very futile objection: in a country like this, it is not to be supposed that a Bishop, when solicited by a proper applicant, will refuse to listen to the statement of the case, or that having listened he will be very likely to commit any injustice; particularly when an appeal may always be made by the injured party to the Archbishop. The requisition of a previous security for the costs from every appellant, is in our eyes a measure calculated not to protect injustice, but to prevent vexation.

That no reform of a general nature is made in our clerical state, we certainly regret: but the present Bill, which is intended only for the relief of that part of the Clergy who are performing the duties of others, is certainly deserving of approbation as far as it goes: and we shall be most happy if we find that the only defect which now appears upon it, shall be removed in the course of its progress through Parliament, by the relief of all those persons who come within its principle, whether temporary Curates, permanent Curates, or Vicars who are virtually Curates.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XVIII.

THE INDEPENDENT WHIG.

A fortnight ago we exposed to our Readers the general vulgarity and folly displayed by the Conductors of the Sunday Newspaper called The Independent Whig, in their accounts of foreign affairs, and its comments and reasoning about them. Now, we shall say something of the merit they have shown in their treatment of domestic concerns: and from a comparison of their foreign and domestic articles, our Readers will see, that whatever good qualities this Paper may want, it certainly has the merit of consistency. Nothing, indeed, but its dissertations on public proceedings at home, could any where be found, to match its dissertations on public proceedings abroad.

We need not look over the files, in order to find matter for the exposure of this pretending print—nor, indeed, would it be easy to find any file of it: for unless the proprietors themselves take the trouble of treasuring its Numbers, who certainly would not suffer us to search its sheets for such a purpose, we should probably be unable to discover any body that would preserve so wretched a publication. As it continues to appear, it of course has readers: but if we may judge by the principles it propagates, and the language in which those principles are propagated, they must be readers who take it only to laugh at it and burn it, or readers circumstanced too narrowly to have more than joint-stock shares in a matter of nine-pence, who of course divide each Number after having read it, and put their separate shares in their pockets for the ordinary uses of waste paper. The two last Numbers will serve us with plenty of examples.

We will begin with a letter published in the last Number but one, by Crito. This Crito assumes the air of Junius, and as Junius signed his letters sometimes Junius, and sometimes Philo-Junius, so in The Independent Whig we see a signature sometimes of Crito, and sometimes of Philo-Crito. The press now groans with these soi-disans Junii: writers, who without general principles of constitutional learning, without knowledge even of their individual themes, without clearness of head, without force of imagination, without plain English, without common grammar, expect to be hailed as epistolary wits, and hope by the immortality of their names to gather, as with a sort of magic, the volatile leaves of the Newspapers into the permanent shape of library volumes. This literary alchemy, this vain expectation of giving to base metals the currency of gold, is indeed a deplorable infatuation! We remember how many a patron has been deceived into ruin by golden bubble-blowers, and we are sorry to see that any of our countrymen are misled into a faith of so ridiculous a kind. In a letter to Lord Ellenborough, this Crito says: "Every creature and plant assimilates" (according to the rules of grammar he would have said assimilate) "the food or "nourishment" (is not the word food rather unnecessary, when the word nourishment in its general sense is used?) "which they "receive into their own substance." To assimilate is to liken: now no animal likens its food into its own substance. Perhaps the writer means incorporate, instead of assimilate: or perhaps he would say, assimilate their food to the natures of their own frames, not to the frames or substances themselves. The nature of the toad is poisonous: and if the toad make his food poison, he may perhaps be said to assimilate it to his own nature. We use his own illustration, for he thus proceeds:

"The toad converts into poison the same juices of which the "bee makes honey: the same breath blown into different in-"struments makes good or harsh music: it is no wonder there-"fore, if that which is all corruption itself, should spoil and "corrupt every thing else which comes into contact with it."

Were they not similes! "Lawyers seem to claim an exclusive "privilege to pervert the signification of words, and the nature "of things" (the infinitive, to pervert, elegantly used instead of the gerund, of perverting), "just as it suits the arbitrary and wick-"ed views of those who employ them, until their scandalous "quibbles and intrigues have rendered language useless, or ra-"ther only a snare to mankind." By the last words in which the whole business of ruin to language is said to be already completed, it becomes evident, that in the earlier part of the sentence Crito should have said, "Lawyers seemed to have claim-"ed:" but Crito does not much mind so trivial an error as the employment of a present tense for a perfect action, a part of which action in the same sentence is declared in the perfect. His gentlemanly and moderate phraseology, however, independently of its grammar, is sure to be approved by the gentlemen of the Bar: for he says: "A becoming zeal for the liber-"ties of the public, and a reverence for truth, are pronounced "by these mercenary depredators, to be a violation of the laws, "and a scandalous attack upon the solemnity of justice. We "are called upon to renounce the best lessons we have imbibed "in our infancy, to confound truth and falsehood, virtue and "vice, and to witness, with indifference, the worst crimes which "can disgrace man and appal humanity;" (elegant climax!) "or if we presume to commisserate the murdered, and express "our horror at the escape of the murderer, we are denominated "libellers, and immediately subject ourselves to pains, penal-"ties, and imprisonments, for the exercise of our humanity!— "we are called upon to surrender our senses to a jargon called "law, by time-serving pleaders: to believe every thing in exact "proportion as we cannot understand it, or as it appears pre-"posterous and absurd: and allow that alone to be law, which "contradicts the first principles of truth and virtue!"

Yet not twenty lines further, this writer says: "By a liber-"ty of the press, my Lord, I would not infer a licentious free-"dom to revile"—(of reviling)—"our lawful Governors and "Magistrates, to traduce,"—(of traducing)—"the established "laws and religion of our country, or any attempts to weaken "and subvert, by opprobrious writings, that sacred respect and "veneration."—(What is the difference between respect and ve-"neration?)—"which ought always to be maintained for persons "in authority."

Thus, then, we find a man professing a veneration for the established laws of his country, and for the persons in authority, at the same time that three-fourths of his letter are a string of invective against the great officers of justice, and an impeachment of the laws for their contradiction of the first principles of truth and virtue. Can any reasonable person regret that the Conductors of this Paper are about to be prosecuted for their libellous and almost universally pernicious doctrines?

This approaching prosecution has, for a long time past, occupied a very conspicuous place in the columns of The Independent Whig. The Editors talk of it, as if any body cared about it except themselves. They address Letters every week to Sir Vicary Gibbs, the Attorney General, who is to bring forward the matter; to Lord Ellenborough, the Chief Justice, who is to try the cause; to the Sheriffs, who are to impannel the Jury; and to the Public, who are requested to support the Paper with money. "The expences of law," they say, "are enormous, "and no private purse can hold out under them." Is not this a malicious slander upon our laws? It must be confessed that the expences of legal proceedings are heavier than the friends of their country wish to see them: but it is shameful to propagate among a set of uninformed persons, whose ears are always open to any thing that may discredit establishment, an opinion that the legal expences attending a petty prosecution are matters too heavy for private finances to sustain. This may have the effect of procuring subscriptions for the Proprietors and Publisher, which obtaining of subscriptions, under false pretences, does not appear to be very justifiable: but it certainly has the effect of dissatisfying the people, and making them believe, contrary to all truth, that the expences of such a law-suit are to be a matter like the costs of Lord Melville's impeachment. There is something not a little entertaining in those parts of each dissertation on the impending trial, which describe the enmity supposed to be entertained by the Attorney General, and by two of the Judges (which Judges they indecorously and unconstitutionally call their assailants) towards the Conductors of The Independent Whig; nor could we help laughing when we found these Conductors observing, that while the public mind was agitated by the present prosecutions, Sir Vicary Gibbs would have done better in introducing no indictment bill, and that he was really grown indiscreet and presumptuous. So little is the public mind agitated, that we will venture to say, there are not fifty creatures, except the people concerned in the prosecutions, and the readers of The Independent Whig, who ever heard that any prosecutions were on foot. And as to the concern that Sir Vicary Gibbs and the Judges take in the business, we are reminded of a ridiculous thing that a storekeeper said the other day to a gentleman on the circuit. This storekeeper had been reprimanded by one of the Judges, because, in the course of some trial, it appeared, that his carelessness in leaving certain waggons exposed had led to the embezzlement of some of the public property. Some time after this, the poor storekeeper heard that the Judge was going to dine with the Prince of Wales. Accordingly he came to the gentleman from whom we heard the anecdote, and gave tokens of the deepest distress, and even despair. "What is the matter, my friend?" said the gentleman, wishing to console him. "Oh, Sir," answered the poor man, "I hear the Judge is going to dine with the Prince of Wales, "he will be sure to tell his Royal Highness of me; his Royal "Highness will tell the King next time he sees him, and then "the King will take my place away from me!"

The Independent Whig has been pleased to accuse the Newspapers in general, of having accepted bribes for the suppression of the manner of Mr. Goldsmid's death. For our own part, we can truly say that we received no application from any of the friends of Mr. Goldsmid, and that we were induced to suppress the fact of his having, through jealousy, committed suicide by our feelings of delicacy towards the survivors: and nothing but the complete publicity of the circumstances at the present moment, should have tempted us to allude to it even thus. We had hoped that it would not become a matter of public notoriety; and sorry indeed should we have been, if for the sake of obtaining approbation from any curious reader, we had been the cause of misery to the friends he has left behind him, or the means of excluding his body from the consecrated ground of his religion. This Paper observes that no body spared Mr. Paull, because Mr. Paull had nobody to pay the Newspaper Editors for their mercy. But an inquest was sitting at a public house on Mr. Paull, and his death could not have been kept a secret; besides there were no family reasons for a delicacy on the subject of his suicide. But these observations, and the article in the end of the last Sunday's Paper, on Suicide in general, and on the advantages that the great enjoy above "offenders of no note or quality," remind us only of the burlesque sentiment of the grave-digger, which may do as well for people of one religion as another:—

"The more pity that great folks should have countenance in "this world to drown or hang themselves, more than other "christians!"

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

AFFAIRS OF SPAIN.

PARIS, APRIL 15.—The King of Spain on being informed that the Emperor Napoleon intends to go to Bayonne, has appointed a Deputation to compliment his Majesty, and to accompany him, in case he should think proper to proceed to Spain. This Deputation consists of the Duke De Frias, the Count Fernand Nunnez, and the Duke De Medina Celi, three Grandees of the first rank. Since the Prince of Peace has been turned out, a Council of Marine has been appointed, at which the King will preside in person.

The Monitteur contains the following articles from Madrid, dated the 30th and 31st of March:—

All the circumstances of the late events are collected, and it is related, amongst other things, that on the 18th, in the evening, the Prince of Asturias said to an Officer of the Guard, "I depend upon you to-night!" and, when this was reported to the Guards, they agreed to prevent the departure of the King, and some pistol shots were exchanged between them and the hussars of the Prince of Peace; but, when the latter saw the people were also rising against them, they filed off, and their Master, who had in vain attempted to repair to the Palace, was surrounded at his own home, and discovered behind a chest. When he was conveying to the barracks of the Spanish guards he escaped to a loft, and hid himself, but being driven from this hiding place, he was taken to the barracks of the Walloon Guards, and in his way thither several stones were thrown at him. When arrived at the latter place he fled into the stables, and concealed himself among the straw. The people who were assembled before the Palace, called loudly to see their Sovereigns. The King and the Prince of Asturias appeared, and were received with shouts of applause. Thereupon the Prince of Asturias repaired to the place where the Prince of Peace was. This unfortunate man appeared before him, his face besmeared with blood, and faint from the loss of blood from the wound in his thigh. He said to the Prince of Asturias, "I pray mercy of your Majesty."—"Manoel," replied the Prince, "do you forget that my father is still alive?"—"I must believe that he is dead," answered the other, "because you command here." And it is asserted, that the Prince added, "My father is not dead, but shortly he shall cease to command; and if I am not yet King, I shall soon be one." The Prince went and surrendered the prisoner.

PARIS, APRIL 16.—The Emperor and King left Bourdeaux on the 11th inst. in his way to Bayonne.

The latest intelligence from Madrid is of the 6th instant, and consists of the following articles, viz.

The order of the day, issued by the Grand Duke of Berg on the 1st of April, informs the army, that the Emperor will be shortly present, and at their head; and General Laribossiere is commanded to see that the troops be perfect in the manœuvres of firing. His Highness also testifies his satisfaction at the good intelligence which prevails betwixt the French and Spanish troops, adding, that a French soldier had been pardoned that very day at the request of the citizens of Madrid, but that this should be the last instance of the kind, and that he exhorts the French soldiers to treat the inhabitants of Madrid with redoubled respect. The first attention of Ferdinand VII. on his accession, was directed to cause the payment of the arrears of pensions due to officers and to their widows; which was done with the money found in the possession of the Prince of Peace, which is supposed to amount to 25 millions, and the remainder of his property is estimated at upwards of 500 millions of francs. The Prince's process is not yet commenced; in the mean while he is closely watched at a village, three leagues from the capital, by 100 life-guards, and 500 foot, whilst his brother, with his favourites, are shut up in a castle. In general, the rage against the Prince is not diminished, and the charges brought against him have already been re-printed five times; it is also asserted, that he had a secret intelligence with the English, and intended to deliver up Ceuta to them, and to place himself under their protection with the whole of his treasure.

SPAIN.

DETAILS OF THE REVOLUTION THAT HAS TAKEN PLACE IN SPAIN.

MADRID, MARCH 19.—There have passed within the last few days, events that have shaken the throne of our Masters. One party accuses the Prince of the Peace of being in concert with the Queen to destroy the Prince of Asturias; the other, that the Prince of Asturias was at the head of a party to dethrone his father. They say that he received this advice originally from his wife. Solemn councils, and long proceedings, followed by acts of banishment, and proclamations, instead of relieving the public mind, inflamed it the more. The French troops, though on the borders of the Ebre, and at a distance of more than forty leagues from our capital, were in a situation of statu quo, which the great numbers of couriers that succeeded each other at every instant, and the important negociations which seemed to be on foot, did not serve to explain. Our troops had been recalled from Portugal, and advanced by forced marches to the capital. The Court appeared divided, and without plan: That which was ordered one day, was contradicted the next. There was neither arrangement nor unity of power. In this state of things, on the 15th March the report was, that the King, who was at Aranjuez, was about to retire to Seville; that a great Council, which had been held at the Palace, had so decided it, but that the opinions on the subject were not agreed; that the Queen and the Prince of the Peace wished to go, but that the Prince of Asturias, and his brother, wished to stay. We were speedily informed, that the troops which were cantoned in Madrid, had orders to quit the city.—Alarm was in every breast, when a proclamation from the King was published on the 16th, which in some degree restored calm. On the 17th it was understood, that the Spanish Guards were to march to Aranjuez, and that the two Regiments of Swiss were alone to remain here. These regiments have not for some time been popular in this city. All the world on this news hurried to the road leading to Aranjuez. "Spaniards," every one cried to the Soldiers, "will you abandon your country? Will you "protect the flight of a Prince who sacrifices his subjects, and "who goes to carry disorder to our Colonies? Have we then as "little spirit as the Inhabitants of Lisbon?"—Several of the Ministers who were not favourable to the departure, circulated hand bills in the surrounding villages, stating what was going on, and the imminent danger in which the country was placed. On the 18th the peasants hurried in crowds to Aranjuez; troops were already stationed on the road to Seville; the town was filled with troops, and the baggage of the Court was packed up in all the apartments. The night between the 17th and 18th was a night of tumult. The house of the Prince of the Peace was defended by his Guards, who had a particular watch-word; those at the Castle had another. At four in the morning the people rushed in crowds to the Palace of the Prince of the Peace, but were repulsed by his Guards. The Life Guards took part with the people, and fell upon the Prince's Guards. The gates were forced, the furniture broken, and the apartments desolated. The Princess of the Peace ran to the staircase, she was conducted to the King's Palace, with all the respect due to her birth and rank. The Prince of the Peace disappeared. Don Diego Godoy, his brother, Commandant of the Life Guards, was arrested by his own soldiers. The King and Queen sat up the whole night between the 17th and 18th. The French Ambassador arrived from Madrid, at five in the morning, and immediately waited on their Majesties. On the 18th, a Proclamation by the King dismissed the Prince of the Peace from his employments, and declared that he would take upon himself the command of his armies. This was published at Aranjuez, and at Madrid. On the receipt of this intelligence, the people of Madrid rushed in crowds to the house of the Prince of the Peace, and to those of several of the Ministers. In all of them the furniture and the windows were broken. There was no one to oppose this disorder, the Captain-General had lost the command. The Swiss regiments remained cantoned in their quarters.

ARANJUEZ, MARCH 21.—From the 16th to the 21st Madrid and Aranjuez have been the theatre of several insurrections, in which the houses of the Prince of the Peace, the Minister of Finance, Soler, the Director of Consolidation, Espicossa, of other Ministers, and of several relations of the Prince of the Peace, have been pillaged, and the furniture burnt in the public streets. The Prince of the Peace has been arrested in a loft in his own house, where he had concealed himself for 36 hours. On the 19th the King issued a Proclamation, No. 1.—(See the National Register, April 17.) On the 17th the King made known, by another Proclamation, that he had dismissed the Prince of the Peace from his employments, and had taken upon himself the command of his army. The tumult, however, still increasing, the King thought fit on the 19th in the evening, to publish the subjoined Decree, No. 2. On the 20th were issued the subjoined publications, Nos. 3. and 4. The head-quarters of the Grand Duke of Berg were at Aranda. On the 19th they were at Somosierra, on the 20th at Brabajo, and on the 21st at Aldevanda. He has with him the divisions of Marshal Moncy and of General Dupont. His arrival appears to be generally desired. The mass of the people of Madrid are calm and tranquil: and, as it happens in similar cases, disorders have only been committed by a small number of individuals.

No. II.—ROYAL DECREE.

My habitual infirmities not permitting me to support any longer the important burden of the Goverment of my Kingdom, and it being requisite for the re-establishment of my health, that I should enjoy in a more temperate climate a private life, I have determined, after mature deliberation, to abdicate my Crown, in favour of my heir, my dearly beloved son the Prince of Asturias.

My Royal will therefore is, that he should be recognised and obeyed, as King and natural Lord of all my Kingdoms and Sovereignties, and in order that this Royal Decree of my free and spontaneous abdication, may be exactly and duly fulfilled, you will communicate it to the Council and to all others whom it may concern.

I, THE KING.

Done at Aranjuez, the 19th March, 1808.

DON PEDRO CEVALLOS.

No. III.—EDICT.

DON ARIAS ANTONIO MORET VELARDE DEAN GOVERNOR PRO INTERIM OF THE COUNCIL.

The King, our Master Ferdinand VIIth, has communicated to me by divers orders, which I have received, that his Majesty has come to the determination of immediately confiscating all the goods, effects, actions, and estates of Don Emanuel Godoy, wherever they may be found, and that for this purpose his Majesty has taken every suitable measure, the said effects belonging immediately to him; that he has also come to the determination of shortly coming to this city to be proclaimed; but, he wishes, that previously the people of Madrid, so devoted and detached to his Royal Person, will give him proofs of calmness and tranquillity; assuring them, that he has given orders against Don Emanuel Godoy, his goods and revenues, which no longer belong to him; that he will think very seriously of repairing the wrongs done to his loving subjects who have suffered in his cause; and lastly, that he will constantly keep in view the adoption of all those measures which are calculated to ensure their happiness.

His Majesty also informs me that he has appointed the Duc d'Infantado Colonel of his Spanish Guards, conferring on him at the same time the Presidency of Castile. The King my Master, wishes that those persons who have been confined in consequence of the events at St. Laurent, will return to his Majesty's presence. In order that this may be known to all, and that the loyal people of Madrid may know how much the King, our Master, labours for his happiness and their welfare, he has ordered me to communicate it to you, which I do by these presents.

Madrid, the 20th March, 1808. DON ARIAS MON.

No. IV.—THE COUNCIL TO THE PEOPLE OF MADRID.

Nothing ought to disturb the public tranquillity in the happy moment of the elevation to the Throne of Spain of the King Ferdinand VIIth. His faithful subjects have given in that happy hour to his Majesty proofs of their devotion and their affection. They ought not to doubt the affection which his Majesty has for them, and that he will employ himself in acts for the public happiness and for the accomplishment of the desires of the people of Madrid.

But what is most important to the success of the elevated views of his Majesty is public order, and that this should be ensured, the Council flatters itself that all the inhabitants of this faithful City will retire to their homes, and that they will remain in the most perfect tranquillity, persuaded that they will then give to his Majesty, in the first moments of his reign, the best testimony of the sincerity of their sentiments, and of those acclamations of fidelity which have been recently heard.

MUNOZ DE TORRES

PROCLAMATION

BY DON BARTOLOME MUGNOZ DE TORRES, SECRETARY TO HIS MAJESTY, COUNCIL, &c.

"I certify that his Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, First Secretary of State and of Dispatches, has communicated to the Dean, Governor, ad interim, of the Council, the following Royal Order:—

"Illustrious Signor, one of the first cares of the King our Master, on ascending the throne, was to notify that happy event to the Emperor of the French and King of Italy, and at the same time to assure his Imperial and Royal Majesty, that, animated by the same sentiments as his august father, far from changing, in the slightest degree, his political system with respect to France, he will endeavour, by all possible means, to draw closer the bands of friendship and strict alliance which fortunately subsist between Spain and the French Empire.

"His Majesty has commanded me to make this communication to you, in order that, upon its publication in Council, the Tribunal may act conformably thereto, in all the measures taken for re-establishing public tranquillity in Madrid, as well as for receiving the French troops, about to enter that city, and administering to them every requisite assistance; endeavouring, at the same time, to convince the people that they come as friends, and for purposes advantageous to the King and the Nation.

"His Majesty flatters himself that the Council, being informed of his earnest desire for more firmly consolidating the connection that exists between him and the Emperor of the French and King of Italy, will study, by all the means in their power, to inspire the inhabitants of Madrid with similar sentiments.

"May God preserve your Excellency many years.

"To the Governor of the Council, ad interim.

"Aranjuez, March 21, 1808."

The Madrid Court Gazette of the 31st of March, contains the following article:—

As the result of the proceedings in the Escurial is not made public, the King has commanded that a short statement should be drawn up relative to this subject, which is much better known since the discoveries made from the Papers of the Prince of Peace, whereof the following are the particulars:—

On the 28th of October last, the late King sent to the Marquis Caballero, Secretary of General Dispatches, several papers, which, it is said, were found among those of the Prince of Asturias, and consist of the following pieces:—

1. A small port-folio of twelve leaves, containing a memorial from the Prince of Asturias, the purport of which is to lay open to the king the life and misconduct of the Prince of Peace, and to request the King to banish him and all his family.

2. A paper of five folios, being a request to employ a number of secret agents to discover and frustrate all the plans of the Prince of Peace, and to provide at the same time, the means which would be proper in those circumstances.

3. A letter, dated Talavora, the 28th May, from Don Juan Esquolquite, Canon and Dignitary of the Church of Toledo, formerly tutor to his Majesty. It is an answer to several questions proposed to him.

4. An instruction and key for a secret cypher, with several numbers and figures, and one leaf with writing on it, but not signed.

[Here follows the account of the proceedings which took place in October, as they were shortly after published.]

MADRID, APRIL 4.—An Ordinance has been published here to prevent mobs and riots, ordering the continuance of the patrole established on the 20th of March, for the public tranquillity. Another Ordinance states, that the King, being highly pleased at the very friendly manner in which the people of Madrid received and used the French troops, was much affected to find, that the carelessness and ill-will of a few people, should have tended to interrupt the said good understanding; and as such conduct proceeds, perhaps, from a ridiculous and unfounded mistrust of the intentions of the said troops in this kingdom, his Majesty assures his subjects that they have nothing to fear from them, and that the intentions of the French Government, concurring with his own, have no other object than the execution of the grand measures, concerted with his Majesty against the common enemy. "This Declaration must be sufficient to tranquillize every reasonable person, and to prepare the most friendly treatment for those esteemed guests.—If, nevertheless, any person should be so daring and hostile to the two Allied Nations, as to interrupt this reciprocal friendship, either by words or deeds, the public is apprized, that the guilty will be forthwith punished without mercy, and with the utmost severity, by a Government, paternally disposed towards faithful and peaceful subjects, but rigorously just and stern against the guilty."

SWEDEN.

PRIVATE CORRESPONDENCE.

"STOCKHOLM, APRIL 16.—To-day the Governor of Stockholm (here called Stathallare,) has been in person upon 'Change, at the usual hour for the meeting of the merchants, and communicated to the public his Majesty's Message to him, authorising a free and uninterrupted correspondence, even with the enemy's countries, provided nothing be written which is unsuitable to the present circumstances, and hostile to the welfare of the country; for which purpose the letters are to be read first, in the Governor's office, signed and sealed up by him, and then restored to the writer, who is then permitted to send them off in what way he pleases. This is a new proof that our King wishes to relieve his subjects, as far as is in his power, from the inconveniencies inseparable from our situation.—According to all the intelligence received here, it appears that a great alteration has taken place in the plans of the Russians in Finland. Instead of pushing forwards against the Swedish Army, they are retiring, and keeping up only a sort of mock attack with a few light troops. The skill and conduct of Count Klingspor cannot be sufficiently praised. He effected his retreat with a force much inferior in numbers, in the face of an hostile army, numerous, well provided with every thing, (French engineers, too, were among them, if the general assertion is to be credited), and conducted by a set of traitors, Springporten, Cnorring, &c. who cannot but be well acquainted with the country; this army always pressing upon him, a proof of which is the incessant fighting which was carried on. This retreat was continued during the length of more than 60 Swedish miles (417 English miles), through a country where there are but few roads, and these rendered almost impracticable by the immense quantity of snow which fell during the winter, bringing with him magazines, stores, &c. which, of course, made his march but slow. He was able to avoid giving battle, and at last, effected an union with the troops under Count Cronstedt, who came from Savolax. The having succeeded in such a task, is a master-piece of military skill, and deserves, perhaps, to be more praised than the famous retreat of Moreau from Germany, when we consider the feeble means at the command of Count Klingspor, the length of the way, and that he marched through a country which he did not dare to lay waste, and whose inhabitants he did not dare to ruin, in order to impede the progress of the enemy's march, which has been very often the resource of the celebrated leaders of our days. His general Aid-de-Camp, Count Gustaf Lowenhjelm, is a young man equally distinguished for valour and skill, and we have rejoiced to perceive, that in many acts of bravery, the troops and subaltern officers have shewn themselves worthy to obey the commanders in whom our Sovereign, with so much justice, has placed his confidence. The reports of a great change in the political plans of Russia, gain ground every day more and more. To day, two couriers are said to have arrived; nothing is published, but the accounts of the Russians leaving Aland, where between 6 and 700 men were arrived, having passed between the Islands. This they did in so precipitate a manner, as not to allow themselves time to bring away the stores which they had collected from the inhabitants. The Count de Saint Priest, who has resided here many years, and was about to leave this country and return to Russia, in consequence of the war, is said to have taken the resolution of postponing his journey, in the hope of soon receiving intelligence which may make his journey unnecessary."

STOCKHOLM, APRIL 11—By an express from Gottenburgh, we have received the information that on the 7th of this month, several English men of war, belonging to the fleet under the command of Admiral Saumarez, and which is destined to the Baltic, arrived at that port; seven transports have also arrived, laden with a considerable quantity of muskets and ammunition, agreeable to a convention made between the two respective Governments.

GERMANY.

BANKS OF THE MAINE, MARCH 14.—In the German Papers we read an article, dated the 8th of March, containing the following information: "The negotiations between the Courts of France and Austria have been very brisk for some time past, from whence it is concluded, that affairs of the last importance are at present under discussion. The Ambassadors of France and Russia, at Vienna, have frequent conferences with one another. In the southern parts of Russia great preparations are making; they are fitting out there a great number of ships of the line and frigates, and the fleet of Sebastopol, in the Crimea, will sail as soon as the season permits. It is supposed, that, in consequence of the interposition of a great power, they will pass the Dardanelles, in order to attack the English fleet there, and probably to unite with the French and Spanish fleets, for the purpose of executing an important enterprize."

In pursuance of an order issued by the Aulic Council of War, eleven regiments of Croats and Pandeers are now assembling to form a cordon on the Turkish frontiers; this cordon is to consist of 70,000 men, and to be commanded by Archduke Ferdinand, brother of the Empress.

RUSSIA.

PETERSBURGH, FEB. 20.—Public notice has been given here, that the Committees appointed by the Imperial Ukase of the 8th of November, 1807, to settle the accounts of Debtor and Creditor, between Russian subjects and Englishmen, have already commenced their sittings in Petersburgh, Riga, and Archangel, and that all Englishmen are accordingly obliged to produce before them correct statements of their property laden in the ships, which are found in Russian ports, of their goods laid up in warehouses, and of their capitals and bills of exchange, with the exception of such monies as are vested in the Russian Banks. Further, that all persons who have any claims on Englishmen, or are indebted to them, are within four months next ensuing the first publication hereof, to declare the same before such of the said Committees as is nearest and most convenient for them; after the expiration of which time, no further claim shall be admitted by the said Committees.—(Stockholm Gazette of April 14.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEB. 24.

Mr. J. Clay wished to know whether by the Act laying an embargo, the President had not the power to permit vessels to depart from the United States. If he had not, a general relief ought to be given to the merchants; for he knew several merchants in Philadelphia, whose circumstances were as hard as those of the persons mentioned in this Bill.

Mr. Newton said, that the power given to the President by the first Section of the Embargo Act had been construed to relate only to vessels carrying dispatches. When the Bill which he this morning presented (in addition to the Act supplementary to the Embargo Act), should come before the House, he intended to offer a Section to give the President discretionary power in all cases.

The Bill was then ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole.

WASHINGTON, FEB. 26.—The President this day communicated an important Message to Congress. The object of which was an augmentation of the Military Force, as well Regulars as of Volunteer Militia; and requests the Legislature to authorise the immediate commencement of this precautionary measure. The President accompanied his Message with some documents, and a letter which he had received from the Secretary at War, of which the following is a Copy :—

" War Department, Feb. 21, 1808.

" TO THE PRESIDENT, &c.

" Sir—I take the liberty of suggesting whether, under existing circumstances, it would not be advisable to propose to Congress an augmentation of our regular troops, as soon as practicable; and also the engaging and organizing of twenty-four thousand Volunteers, on the principles I have had the honour of proposing for your consideration, the general outlines of which are contained in the Paper marked No. 1.

" The number of regular troops I would propose being raised immediately is six thousand, to be composed of suitable proportions of infantry, artillery, cavalry, and riflemen, and organized, as stated in the inclosed Paper, No. 2.

" It may be presumed that previous to the close of the present Session, Congress will be possessed of such further information in regard to our foreign relations, as will be necessary for forming an ultimate opinion on the expediency of a greater augumentation of our army than is now proposed; and in the mean time measures may be taken for the recruiting service in different parts of the United States.

" In the event of war, it will, I presume, be considered necessary to arrange our military force into separate departments, and to have a Commander to each department, and of course to have no such officer as a Commander in Chief; and until a larger army shall be raised than is now proposed, it may not be advisable to have any officer above the rank of Brigadier-General; of that rank it may be proper to have four or five, as soon as a suitable proportion of the troops is raised. With sentiments, &c, &c, " H. DEARBORN.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

THURSDAY, APRIL 28.

LORD HAWKESBURY laid on the table several returns respecting the Danish vessels detained previous to the commencement of hostilities.

LORD SIDMOUTH observed, that an additional paper was necessary to the purpose of putting the House completely in possession of the information on which he meant to ground the motion of which he gave notice on the 18th of March. He should therefore move an address to his Majesty, praying him to lay before the House copies of any instructions issued for the detention of Danish vessels, from the 1st of June to the 1st of Sept. 1807. The motion was agreed to; and his Lordship, on the supposition that the desired information would be produced before Tuesday next, gave notice that he should then submit his intended motion on the whole of this subject. The House was accordingly summoned for Tuesday.

The Bills on the table were forwarded one stage,—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 29.

Lord Carleton (Earl of Shannon, in Ireland) was introduced with the usual solemnities, and took the oaths and his seat.

In the Roxburgh Appeal Cause, Carre v. Innes, Mr. Adam, as Counsel on behalf of the Appellant, was heard at considerable length, after which the further proceedings were postponed until Monday next.

DANISH SHIPS.

LORD SIDMOUTH rose and observed, that in perusing the Papers which had been laid before the House yesterday upon this subject, he had not found any Return made in compliance with the third and fourth orders of their Lordships, of the 29th March last, respecting the number of Danish Merchant Vessels discharged by the Prize Court of Admiralty, but subsequently condemned, upon the commencement of hostilities with that country; or the number of captains and crews of such Danish ships, also detained as prisoners of war. In answer to one of those orders, a letter had been received from the Head of the Transport Board (Commissioner George), but it was by no means satisfactory. His Lordship was therefore under the necessity of now moving, That the third and fourth orders of that House, of the 18th March last, be duly complied with. In consequence of this, his Lordship exceedingly regretted the necessity of postponing his motion upon this subject, which he had given notice of for Tuesday next; but when those Returns he before alluded to were before the House, and printed, he should give notice of some propositions which he should then offer for the consideration of their Lordships. Both his Lordships motions were put and agreed to.

Mr. Wharton, and a Deputation from the Commons, brought up the Irish Recognizance Bill, the Irish Title Bill, and three private Bills, which were severally read a first time.

After some further routine business, the House adjourned until Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, APRIL 26.

Mr. Jekyll presented a Petition from the Debtors confined in the King's Bench Prison, and Col. Longfield from those in Cork Gaol, praying for relief, which were ordered to be laid on the table.

The Trone Harbour Bill was read a third time and passed.

On the Motion of Mr. Rose, the Pilots Bill was ordered to be taken into consideration on Monday next.

On the Motion of Mr. Tierney the further hearing of evidence, respecting the Orders in Council, was deferred till Monday next.

MR. GRANT presented a Petition from the East India Company, praying for a certain sum of money, which the Company deemed it their duty to claim, conceiving it to be due. After the Petition was read, Mr. Grant moved that it should be referred to the Committee now sitting for investigating the Company's Affairs.

MR. M. A. TAYLOR said the Petition was of great importance, and in so thin a House the question ought not to be Agitated. He conceived that previous notice should have been given; he, however, deemed it his duty to oppose it on the ground that the Company had no claim on the country. Their monopoly was an evil which he deprecated as injurious to the spirit of enterprise, and though it had been held out for 24 years, that their affairs were in a prosperous state, yet it was now found they were fatally the reverse; he, therefore, could not consent to have a single shilling taken from his constituents to relieve them, as other countries profited more by the trade than this.

MR. CREEVY thought it useless to grant them a loan, as they could never repay it. They had borrowed three millions last year on Bonds; this year they came to Parliament praying for the aid of 2,400,000*l.* and if the situation of Europe continued in its present state, they must come again next year for a larger sum. He thought it would be more beneficial to the country at large, to have the trade laid open, than to allow the Americans to run away with the profit of it. With the Company it has long been a losing concern, as they had no surplus capital to carry it on as they should. The system of borrowing money in India, and the large dividends on their stock, was the source of all their evils.

MR. PONSONBY conceived this sum as a gift to be levied on the Public, to enable the Company to make a dividend of 10 per cent. It was a serious matter, and ought to have a mature investigation, which he hoped would destroy for ever the delusion which had existed for several years. The question now was, that the country must support them, as they were not able to do it themselves. The Report of the Committee, and the whole evidence, should be printed before he suffered 1,400,000*l.* to go out of the pockets of the people, who ought to be convinced that it was the interest of the nation to continue them as a Company.

MR. PERCEVAL said, there could be no objection to have the Petition referred to the Committee, for as the Company had a claim on the public of several hundred thousand pounds, they had a right to be heard.

MR. MONCKTON remarked, that there seemed to be a total suppression of public documents from the Company. The last Budget was that of 1803-4, and from that time, had there been no information of any kind given, either to the House or the Public, in relation to the situation of the Company's affairs. What he required was, a full, fair, and candid statement of the Company's debts, credits, and assets.

The question was then put and carried.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27.

Lord Bernard presented a Petition from the Debtors confined in Cork gaol, praying relief.—Laid on the table.

Colonel Stanley brought up a Bill making certain alterations in the Poor Laws, in regard to Settlements.—Read a first, and ordered to be read a second time, on the 16th of May next.

Mr. Alderman Combe obtained leave to bring in a Bill preventing forcible or fraudulent carrying away of young children, commonly called child stealing. Read a first time.

Mr. Tremayne rose pursuant to a notice, to move for leave to bring in a Bill for interring the dead bodies of persons drowned through shipwrecks, that might be washed ashore on the coasts of England and Wales. The Hon. Gentleman stated, that many afflicting instances had occurred, where dead bodies so thrown ashore had been utterly neglected; and other instances had happened, where the dead had been buried in heaps, which was certainly most disgusting, and highly improper. There were two recent instances where this had been the case, namely, in the wreck of the Anson frigate, and in that of a transport from Buenos Ayres with troops. He meant to propose that the person finding a dead body so washed ashore, should be compelled to give immediate notice to the parish officers, who shall bury the person, the expences of such interments to be defrayed by the county treasures. The Hon. Gentleman obtained leave to bring in a Bill accordingly.

Mr. Warple gave notice that on Monday, on the Report, he should move a variety of amendments on the Assessed Taxes Consolidation Bill. Being on his legs, he wished to learn from Ministers, whether they meant to take any steps on the 5th Report of the Committee of Military Enquiry, respecting the Medical Board. He wished to know whether Ministers meant to let the enormities there stated pass unnoticed and unpunished.

Mr. Perceval replied, that the report alluded to by the Hon. Gent. was so voluminous that Ministers had not had sufficient time to turn their attention to it. Of course he could give no answer to the Hon. Gentleman's question.

On the motion of Mr. Foster, the House resolved into a Committee of Supply on Irish Miscellaneous Services. The first resolution proposed by Mr. Foster was a sum of 10,600*l.* for printing in the Dublin Gazette, and other Newspapers, Proclamations, &c. by the Government.

Mr. Parnell objected to the motion, and stated that he should move as an amendment, that the words "other Newspapers," be omitted. He was induced to this from the fact of these Newspapers having published, one of them, on the 21st of January last, a proclamation, prohibiting intercourse with vessels coming from Gibraltar and the Mediterranean, on account of a fever that raged in the garrison at that fortress three years ago. He quoted other instances equally absurd.

Mr. Croaker said he could account for the insertion of these antiquated proclamations in the Irish Papers. He had the honour of knowing the editor of one of them; and often wondered how he contrived to fill up his paper. His friend told him he felt some difficulty often when the wind was contrary, and the mails from Britain did not arrive, but he had always a salve for that sore, by putting in a column or two of old proclamations by the Government, which were generally kept as standing matter to fill a chasm so occasioned. (A laugh.)

Mr. Perceval said the Hon. Gentleman's objection not being to the amount of the sum, he should wish the grant to pass, as these abuses would be thoroughly investigated by next year.

After a few words from Sir John Newport and Mr. Foster, the item was agreed to.—25,000*l.* Irish currency, for the purposes of criminal prosecutions, and other law expences; 937*l.* ditto, for carrying on the discoveries which were begun in the gold mines of Wicklow mountains; 2,000*l.* ditto, for the Cork Institution; 1,854*l.* ditto, for repairs of Dr. Stevens's Hospital; 4,038*l.* ditto, for erecting buildings, in addition to Sir Patrick Dunn's Hospital; 512*l.* 8*s.* ditto, to Edward Kent, for arrears paid through mistake to the Treasury in Ireland; 4,434*l.* ditto, for salaries to Lottery-Officers in Ireland. The Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

On the motion of Mr. Huskisson, the House resolved itself into a Committee of Ways and Means, when he proposed that the sum of 2,223,000*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.* being the surplus of the Grants of last year, which exceeded the Estimates, be applied to the service of the current year; that the Pay of the Militia of England be provided for from the proceeds of the Land-Tax, and that of Ireland from the Consolidated Fund of that Country. The Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

Mr. S. R. Lushington moved for the Returns of Wheat, Barley, and Rye, imported to this country since the 1st of January, 1795, and the bounties paid thereon, which were granted. Adjourned.

THURSDAY, APRIL 28.

The House met at the usual hour of four o'clock, but there being only 40 Members present to make a ballot for the Borough of Grampound, they proceeded to the orders of the day, and the Grenville Act requiring 100 Members, the House immediately adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 29.

A message from the Lords acquainted the House, that their Lordships had agreed to the Irish Wool Export, and other Bills.

Mr. Tremayne brought in the Burial Bill, which was read a first time, and ordered to be read again on Thursday next and printed.

Mr. Long moved for leave to bring in a Bill for the better examining and auditing the accounts of the Paymaster General. There were (he said) accounts in the Paymaster's office which have been laying there these 25 years unaudited, and from a difficulty of obtaining vouchers, the Paymaster's cash account could not be made up: it was, therefore, with a view to remedy this inconvenience that the Bill was submitted. In future it was intended that the monies issued from the Paymaster General's office should be by warrant instead of letter.

Mr. Owen, from the India House, presented at the Bar the annual accounts of the East India Company, which were ordered to be referred to the Committee for investigating the Company's affairs.

Mr. Huskisson, in the absence of Lord Castlereagh, postponed the second reading of the Local Militia Bill, which stood for to-day, till Monday next.

On the motion of Mr. Foster, the House resolved itself into a Committee, to consider of the supplies granted to his Majesty, when he proposed that 9250*l.* Irish currency, be granted towards the support of the College of Maynooth.

Sir J. Newport said, the sum was too small, and proposed an amendment, making it 13,000*l.* Before the war, there had been a considerable number of students educated for the Priesthood in France, Italy, Flanders, Spain, and Lisbon, who were now prevented from going there for their education; therefore it was proper to have them educated at home, and abstract their minds from any foreign principle or politics.

The amendment was negatived, the Ayes being 58, Noes 93.

The House went into a Committee of Ways and Means for Ireland, Mr. Foster stated, that the resolutions he had to move were more matters of regulation than otherwise. With regard to carriages, he did not mean that two should pay so much as the double of one, or that three should pay as the triple of one, and so on. With regard to posting carriages, he meant to lay them aside entirely. He ought to state that the tax on grey hounds would be raised higher than those on other species of dogs. He also intended that all licences issued by the Commissioners of Excise should be charged with a stamp duty. He moved resolutions accordingly which were agreed to.

The motion of Mr. Lethbridge for imposing a duty of 5*l.* 5*s.* on every double barrelled gun used in killing game, was negatived. The Ayes being 17, and the Noes 64.—Adjourned till Monday.

PROVINCIALS.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR APRIL.

The cold weather has not proved unfavourable to the Wheats, as in most districts where good hoeing husbandry prevails, they were never known to stock, and branch more freely.—The plants of Beans and Pease, especially the last, have suffered much in open countries, from the sharp frosty nights; as have also the early sown Barleys; but those latterly got in, and the Oats, look generally promising.—Spring seed is found every where very short, and backward; but the late rains have much improved the meadow, and other grass lands, which want only warm weather to push out plenty of feed; the young Clovers, and Ray-Grass, keep their plant well. The Hay markets are rather higher than the last month's prices. Hops in the Kentish, and Sussex grounds, being full of bine, stock the poles abundantly. Smithfield has been rather thinly supplied for the last two or three weeks with prime Beef, which, however, is the only article that has found an advance in price.—Lean Stock has had a start in consequence of the late showers; but though the show of Scots, and Welch Runts on Epping Forest (the first spring mart in the Home Counties) has been considerable, the demand has not been large in proportion.—Stock Sheep are somewhat cheaper, and the Wool markets continue dull at last month's prices.

Last week the daughter of a respectable farmer in one of the villages, near Wakefield, was apprehended on a charge of writing threatening letters to two gentlemen of Sheffield. By the same post each received a letter, threatening, that if a certain sum of money was not immediately sent to a particular address to be left at the post-office in Wakefield, a charge of having committed an unnatural crime would immediately be sworn against him. They both consulted the same professional gentleman, by whose advice a letter was sent addressed as ordered, and the postmaster of that town was directed to watch and apprehend the person who should call for it. The lady in question came, and was dogged to a shop in the town, but before her apprehension she had by some means got quit of the letter she had just received. Bail has, however, been given for her appearance at the ensuing Sessions, and the parties are bound to prosecute.

On Saturday week Mary Chandler, convicted of setting fire to her master's house in Liverpool, was executed at Lancaster. She was 19 years of age, and so ignorant of religious duties as to be unable to repeat the Lord's Prayer. As the executioner was putting the cap over her face, she exclaimed, "O man, I pray will forgive you!" and her shrieks were very piercing.

SIR, Grasshopper, off Carthagena, Dec. 12.

I have to acquaint you, that yesterday, when looking out off Cape Palos, agreeably to your directions, I discovered a number of the enemy's vessels at anchor under the Cape: his Catholic Majesty's brig of war St. Joseph, of 12 24-pounders, manned with 99 men, and commanded by Don Antonio de Torres Teniento de Navire, got under weigh, and came out to attack his Majesty's sloop Grasshopper, under my command, accompanied by the two vessels of war, belonging to his Catholic Majesty, named in the margin *. The St. Joseph I brought to close action, when, after fifteen minutes resistance, she struck her colours, and ran on shore; upon which I anchored, and with the greatest exertions of the officers and ships company, succeeded in getting her off. The other two vessels bore up, and made all sail from us the moment the brig struck, or I have no doubt we should have captured the whole of them.

I beg leave to observe, that I received every assistance from Lieutenant Cornelius Wellis, whose good conduct on this and every other occasion, merits my warmest thanks; the conduct of all the officers and men gave me great satisfaction.

In this affair we had two men severely wounded. The loss of the enemy I could not ascertain, as a number of them jumped overboard, and I fear a great number of them were drowned.

The St. Joseph is only six years old, is copper-fastened, and well found in every respect, sails remarkably fast, is pierced for 16 guns, is 145 tons burthen, and in my opinion well calculated for his Majesty's service. I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) T. SEARLE, Captain.

* St. Medusa Mestrio, ten 24-pounders, and 77 men; St. Argle Mestrio, eight 24-pounders, and 50 men.

[Transmitted by Admiral Purvis.]

SIR, Alceste, in shore, off Cadiz, April 4.

I have the honour to inform you, that when at anchor to-day with his Majesty's ships Mercury, and Grasshopper brig, St. Sebastian's Lighthouse S.E. distance 3 miles, wind W.S.W. a large convoy of the enemy was discovered coming close along shore from the northward, under the protection of about twenty gunboats, and a numerous train of flying artillery on the beach. At three P.M. I made the signal to weigh and attack the convoy, and stood directly in for the body of them, then off the town of Rota; at four, the shot and shells from the gun-boats and batteries going far over us, his Majesty's ships opened their fire, which was kept with great vivacity until half-past six, when we had taken seven of the convoy, and drove a great many more on shore on the surf; compelled the gun-boats to retreat, which they did very reluctantly, and not until two of them were destroyed; and actually silenced the batteries at Rota, which latter service was performed by the extraordinary gallantry and good conduct of Captain Searle, of the Grasshopper, who kept in upon the shoal to the southward of the town, so near as to drive the enemy from their guns with grape from his 32-pound carronades, and at the same time kept in check a division of gun-boats that had come out from Cadiz to assist the others engaged by the Alceste and Mercury. It was a general cry in both ships, "Only look how nobly the brig behaves!" The situation of our little squadron was rather a critical one, tacking every fifteen minutes close on the edge of the shoal, with the wind in, and frequently engaged both sides; in the heat of the action, the First Lieutenant, Allen Stewart, volunteered to board the convoy, if I would give him the boats. I was so struck with the gallantry of the offer, that I could not refrain from granting them, although attended with great risk. He went, accompanied with Lieutenant Pipon and Lieutenant Hawky of the Royal Marines, who most handsomely volunteered to go, as their party were chiefly employed in working the ship. Mr. Arscott and Mr. Day, Masters' Mates, Messrs. Parker, Adair, Crooker, M'Caul, and M'Lean, Midshipmen; they were soon followed by the Mercury's boats, under the command of the First Lieutenant, W. O. Pell, accompanied by Lieutenant Gordon, and Lieutenat Whylock, Mr. Ducain and Mr. R. Cummings, Master' Mates. The boats, led by Lieutenant Stewart, pushed on in the most gallant manner, boarded and brought out seven tartans from under the very muzzles of the enemy's guns, and from under the protection of the barges and pinnaces of the combined fleet, which had by that time joined the gun-boats. I was greatly indebted to Lieutenants Hickman and Jervois (who both wished to go in the boats), for the spirited and well directed fire they kept up from the main-deck; also to Mr. Westlake, the Master, for his great attention in steering and working the ship; and I have much pleasure in adding, that the other officers, seamen, and marines, behaved with the utmost bravery and coolness. Capts. Gordon and Searle (whose gallantry and excellent conduct it might be presumption in an officer of my standing in the service to comment upon) also report upon the great bravery and coolness of their respective officers, seamen, and marines. It is with pleasure I have to add, that the frigates have received no material damage; the Mercury, an anchor shot away, her sails and rigging cut, though not much; our sails and rigging in the same way; but the Grasshopper, I am sorry to say, is a great deal damaged in the hull, the main-top-mast shot through, shrouds, sails, and running-rigging cut almost to pieces: she had one man mortally wounded, the gunner and two others wounded, but not severely.

The captured vessels are all loaded on Government account for the arsenal at Cadiz; and, I am happy to say, there is a very considerable quantity of valuable ship timber.

The zest of this little service was greatly heightened by being performed in the mouth of Cadiz harbour, and in the teeth of eleven sail of the line. I am, &c.

SIR, Decouverte, St. Domingo, Feb. 8.

I beg leave to acquaint you, that at one P. M. yesterday the 7th instant, when running down between Altavella and the Main, I discovered three sail in this bay, which I soon found to be two schooners, (enemy's cruizers,) and an English ship, their prize; one of the former made her escape to windward; after a running fire for a considerable time, I drove the other and the ship on shore; the hopes of recovering the ship induced me to anchor all night, and sound the bay, for the purpose of getting near her in the morning, which I accomplished within musket-shot, when I found her in possession of the enemy, covered by small arm men from the shore; after considerable firing from the Decouverte, we drove the enemy out of the ship, and by a flag of truce I demanded her and whatever prisoners might be on board the schooner, but was refused. Finding, from circumstances, it impossible to get her off, I directed Mr. M'Intire, master of the Decouverte, with a detachment of small-arm men, to set her, if possible, on fire, a service which he performed in a most handsome manner, under a very heavy fire from the enemy: the privateer should have shared the same fate had we water to get near her, but she is perfectly lost, having bilged on the rocks; the ship was the Matilda, of Halifax, bound to Jamaica.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) COLIN CAMPBELL.

SIR, Decouverte, off St. Domingo, Feb. 8.

I have the honour to inform you, that I this morning at day-light discovered a schooner in Bottomless Cove, and, after a long chace, came up with her at three P. M. when I found her to be an enemy's cruizer: at half past three we commenced action with her, which continued at half pistol-shot from her, for forty-five minutes, when she struck to his Majesty's schooner under my command. I find her to be La Dorade from St. Domingo, commanded by Monsieur Nelly, mounting a long eighteen pounder, two nines, and seventy-two men. The enemy's loss has been considerable; they left us the distressing duty of committing seven of them to the deep after the action, and about the same number, I find, were thrown over during it: their loss appears to have been about fourteen killed, and three wounded. I am sorry to be under the necessity of annexing a list of wounded belonging to the Decouverte, most of them, I fear, dangerous; but when I consider the obstinate resistance of the enemy, I think we are, on the whole, fortunate. Three of our guns were dismounted the second round, on the side we engaged, which gave the enemy a great advantage, as well as a superiority of force over us. I feel much satisfaction in the capture of this vessel, as from her fast sailing, and the intrepidity of her crew, she might have done much mischief. I beg leave to express my highest approbation of the conduct of Mr. M'Intire, master of the Decouverte, on this occasion. Being sensible of my over deficiency in writing briefly, I hope you will forgive my intruding so much on your time by such long letters.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) Colin Campbell.

A List of Men Wounded.—Matthias Vos, seaman, supposed mortally; John Ismay, Boatswain's Mate; Benj. Hodgherson, James Johnson, and Moses Page, seamen, dangerously; and John Brown (1) seaman, not dangerously.

Sir, Meleager, off Cuba, Feb. 9.

I beg leave to inform you, last night the barge, cutter and jolly-boat, with forty-one men, under the command of Lieutenant Tupman, with Lieutenant Swinburn, and Lieutenant Denne of the Royal Marines, boarded in a very gallant manner, and captured without loss, Le Renard, French Felucca rigged privateer, armed with one long six-pounder, a large proportion of muskets, and forty-seven men, eighteen of which jumped overboard and swam for the shore. She was perfectly prepared, expecting to be attacked by the boats of a man of war brig that chaced her in the day. Le Renard sails very fast; had been twenty-seven days at sea, and, I am happy to say, without making a capture.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Sigued) J. Broughton, Capt.

The Gazette contains letters from Capt. Broughton, of his Majesty's ship Meleager, and Capt. Coghlan, of the brig Elk, the former gives advice of his having captured the Antelope, a Spanish schooner letter of marque, pierced for 14 guns, and 62 men, and laden with dry goods, brandy, and wine; the latter gives an account of his having captured the French schooner privateer Harlequin, carrying two carriage guns, a quantity of small arms and fifty-four men, and laden with a cargo of coffee and sugar.

The Gazette also contains a long letter from Captain Rainier, dated the 19th of October, 1806, being the duplicate of one sent to Sir T. Trowbridge, attaching the following list of Dutch ships taken and run on shore at Batavia, on the 18th of Oct. 1806, by the Caroline, viz. Zecrop, 14 guns, Capt. Croot, taken; Maria Reygersbergen, Commodore Jager, ditto; Phœnix, 36 guns, Capt. Vanderzader; Maria Wilhelmina, six guns; William, 20 guns, Capt. Fitters; Patriot, 18 guns; Zeeplong, 14 guns; and seven merchant ships, run on shore. In the attack made on these ships, the particulars of which have been given a year ago, the following was the loss in killed and wounded, sustained by the Caroline.—Killed—J. Lawson, W. Williams, and W. Rickets, seamen; and four Dutch prisoners, who were in the hold.—Wounded dangerously, (since dead)—Lieut. Williams, Marine; W. Gibbs, W. Longmore, J. Terryl, and D. Sulivan, seamen; and E. Barnes, marine.—Wounded slightly—T. Pearson, W. M. Thomas, J. Howe, B. Maxwell, J. Lance, M. M'Cormac, J. Morrison, A. Creighton, T. Robinson, R. Brownsdep, W. Isby, and J. Lattrie, seamen.

TO THE LOVERS OF THE ARTS, THE DRAMA, AND CLASSICAL LITERATURE.

This Day is published,

DRAMATIC MEMOIRS AND CRITICISMS OF EMINENT PERFORMERS,

With exquisite whole-length Portraits of the most celebrated Actors and Actresses of the present day, in Character,

Painted from LIFE by Mr. DE WILDE and Miss EMMA SMITH,

And engraven by MR. SCRIVEN,

Which form ONE of the additional and attractive features in that admired Publication

LE BEAU MONDE, or, LITERARY and FASHIONABLE MAGAZINE.

The above new and costly feature commenced with the last Number of the Magazine, which is embellished with a striking Likeness of Mr. LISTON, as Caper, in the new and popular farce of Who Wins? or, The Widow's Choice, a Sketch of his Life, and Criticisms upon his general performance, illustrate the Portrait.

The twenty-first Number of the Work will be published To-morrow, price 2s. 6d. and will present to the admirers of the Arts and the Drama, Mr. SIMMONS, as Beau Mordecai, in the favourite farce of Love-à-la-Mode, with a Sketch of his Life, and a masterly Criticism upon his general performance; and which will be followed by Mr. BANNISTER, as Echo, in the World, and Miss SMITH, as Portia, in the Merchant of Venice; all engraved in the same splendid style.

The Proprietors of Le Beau Monde Magazine, determined to render their Work pre-eminently conspicuous in Literature and the Arts, have commenced with the present Number of their elegant Publication, another additional and highly interesting feature, the recent discoveries in HERCULANEUM, POMPEII, &c.

and which will be illustrated by historical descriptions, classical analyses, and finished engravings from original drawings taken on the spot. The clearing away of the Temple of Isis, at Pompeii, is proposed to be the subject of the first embellishment, engraved by Mr. Mittan, and will be eminently illustrative of the architectural elegance of that seat of Roman magnificence, and of the manner of restoring those beauties to day. It will also be highly interesting to the Naturalist, as exhibiting the Strata of Tufa, which has so long covered these august remains. The other embellishments are a most exquisite Portrait of the Right Hon. Lord Grenville, painted by HOPPNER, and engraved by SCRIVEN; three beautifully coloured Costumes for Ladies and Gentlemen, &c. &c. Its Literature has never been surpassed in any Magazine, and contains the Life of *Lord Grenville—History of France—Original Communications—The Arbitrator, No. VII. which is a Review of the Satirist—Advice to Painters—La Bonne Bouche—Epic Poetry, Lucan—A Letter from the Dead to the Living—Review of Literature—Rev. POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

THE ROCHEFORT AND TOULON SQUADRONS.

The Centurion, which has arrived at Plymouth from Gibraltar, and the Statira, the frigate that brought Mr. ROSE, declare that the Rochefort Squadron did in fact go to Toulon. The Apollo frigate, on the 12th of February, saw the united Squadrons of Rochefort and Toulon standing towards the Hieres Islands, in thick weather and a gale of wind. It was understood that they reached the Adriatic towards the end of February.

Letters from Genoa, of the 8th instant, inform us, that the combined Squadrons of Toulon and Rochefort, under command of Admiral GANTHEAUME, were arrived in the Gulf of Naples, that the fleets were in the best condition, and that they had furnished the island of Corfu with goods and ammunition. Some accounts, however, state, that Admiral GANTHEAUME was at Corfu with one Squadron, and that another, which was off Tarento, had captured some English ships. It is further stated, that the Russian ships at Tarento had taken in provisions for several months; that these, as well as the ships of war at Venice, had been ordered to sail; and that it was expected an attempt would shortly be made against Sicily.

One Dutch Paper says, that the combined squadrons of Rochefort and Brest (for which latter place Toulon is probably to be understood) fell in with Lord COLLINGWOOD's fleet near Genoa, but not being strong enough to give battle, put into St. Pietro d'Arena, where they were immediately blockaded by the English. Pietro d'Arena, we believe, is an unprotected harbour in the Gulph of Genoa. If the fleets have really put into this port, Lord COLLINGWOOD has probably attacked them; and in this case we can entertain little doubt of a glorious result.

The Captain of the Diana, which is just arrived at Plymouth, states, that in his passage he encountered a vessel from Rochefort, which declared a rumour to be current at that place of an action having taken place near the Streights between the British and French fleets, in which the latter had one line-of-battle ship blown up, two sunk, and eight taken. We have at this late period no means of ascertaining the truth of this statement; we mention it but as report.

FRENCH EXPEDITION TO INDIA.

Hamburgh Papers to the 13th instant have arrived; and one article, in a Paper of the 9th, is certainly interesting, if it be true. It asserts that BONAPARTE has obtained the consent of the Porte for the passage of French troops through its territory to Persia, in order to the invasion of India by land. The intelligence is contained in these words:—

"VIENNA, MARCH 30.—The Porte has permitted the march of French troops through its territory towards Persia. On the 6th and 7th instant a great Divan was holden, in which the proposition of the Emperor of the French, for marching a corps of troops through the Turkish dominions into Persia, was discussed, and finally acceded to by the Government."

The news was brought to Vienna by an extraordinary Courier.

The experience that we have had of BONAPARTE's enterprising spirit, should make us slow to assert that any measure is unlikely to be affected by him, merely because it appears to be difficult. But the obstacles to such a project as the invasion of India by land appear to be so strong and so numerous, that we are inclined to believe that he has either contrived this agreement with the Porte, in order to get a good opportunity of filling Turkey with French troops, or that the proposal for an invasion of India, like the proposal for the invasion of England, is one of those magnificent impostures, which he holds out without the smallest intention of ever executing them, for the sake of alarming those among his enemies whose interests might be affected by the operation, and of keeping alive the attention of his own subjects, by that perpetual promise and prospect of progression which is so necessary for the restless spirits of the French soldiers.

REPORT OF THE DEATH OF THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

Accounts have just been received in town from Edinburgh, of the 27th inst. announcing the arrival of his Majesty's sloop Snake, from Gottenburgh, with intelligence that, on the 20th instant, reports were current at Gottenburgh of the death of the Emperor of RUSSIA, who was stated to have fallen by the hands of his own subjects. The accounts indeed from Gottenburgh of the 22d and 23d instant are silent respecting such an event; but letters were received in town on Friday, which contain some indirect allusions to some uncommon transactions in the Russian capital. One of these letters, from St. Petersburgh, has this remarkable expression: "Dreadful work is going on here;" but perhaps this phrase may apply to commercial difficulties only.

If any belief may be attached to such a report, it should seem that favourable results may be expected for England. We are at a loss to conceive how any revolution should have arisen in Russia, and terminated in the slaughter of ALEXANDER, unless it were a revolution against French influence. The people of Russia are not a race of beings likely to have risen in assertion of any civil rights; and we do not know why the Nobles should have occasioned an insurrection, except in order to counteract a system of influence which might be displeasing to them.

In another part of our Paper we give further details of the proceedings in Spain. We are not disposed to expect much that can be very favourable to this country. The dispositions of the new Ministers were relied on by some persons as promising a fortunate result to Great Britain: but we think that facts, which are always better evidence than characters, seem to indicate nothing that can be dangerous to the French Power. The disposition of the new King of Spain appears very clearly from the message that he has communicated to the heads of the Council, by Don PEDRO CEVALLOS; and whether that disposition have been occasioned by friendship, or by fear, we shall care very little, as long as we find it so decidedly friendly towards France. A further argument of the new King's good-will to the French interests, may be gathered from his having declared, that he some time ago determined on asking in marriage a French Princess of the Blood. That the people are unfriendly to the French is not to be believed, only because some little disagreements arise between the Spanish mob and the French soldiery: for the people of any country may quarrel with those persons as guests, to whom they may have no objection as allies. But at any rate, even if we had reason to think that the people, the Ministers, and the King, were all of them hostile to France, we should expect from such a hostility no ultimate advantage to the interests of Great Britain, or to the tranquillity of Europe. BONAPARTE and his troops are hovering over Spain: the Spanish armies have been sent away from home: what can we expect? Why, we must expect to see the Spanish monarchy a province of France, and to find the young Prince of Asturias, who has just mounted the throne, as completely a viceroy of the French Emperor, as the fraternal Kings of Naples, Westphalia, and Holland!

In the early part of the week rumours prevailed that General ARMSTRONG was coming to this country, authorised by the American Government, with the consent of BONAPARTE, to act in conjunction with Mr. PINCKNEY, as Mediator between England and France. This news, however, is now universally discredited.

From the silence of Government, as to Mr. ROSE's account of his mission, we augur nothing favourable. The fact seems to be, that except the adjustment, matters remain exactly as they were. Mr. NOURSE, with his dispatches has now been a month at Paris: and we fear it will be found that the French mean to take post in the Floridas, in order to overawe the United States.

From the American papers we find that their government have shown a disposition to increase their military force. However in the Message from the President, introducing this measure, there was no pointed allusion to either of the European Belligerent Powers. In other accounts of debates, which we have not thought it necessary to insert, there is a reference made to the confidential correspondence of the American Ministers, which had been imparted to the Legislative body: but these papers at full were not then made public.

BERNADOTTE has left Zealand; but it seems that his departure has been occasioned, not by fear of blockade from British cruizers, but by the necessity of suppressing some disorders which manifested themselves in the French island of Funen.

Advices from Gottenburgh, of the 18th ult. announce that a detachment of the Swedish army has advanced from Wermeland, without much opposition, almost fifty English miles into Norway. The same advices mention reports to have arrived from Stockholm, which state, that the Russian army in Finland had halted for want of provisions. The retreat of General KINGSPOR, of which we have given a detailed account under the head of Foreign Intelligence, is hailed by the Swedes as a master-piece of military skill.

The Gottenburgh Mails have brought word also, that the Austrians were drawing close to the Turkish frontier, and that the Servians and French were nearly in contact. The Russian troops too, who have been in Italy, were marching into Dalmatia.

The preparations for the new Expedition have been vigorously continued. Sir JAMES SAUMAREZ, the Admiral, will sail in the Victory; and the Mars, is the ship of Rear-Admiral KEATS. In the Fleet will be the Minotaur, Tigre, Polyphemus, and Audacious, all of the line. The 4th, and three companies of the 95th, were to embark on Thursday.

General FRAZER will go to the Baltic second in command under Sir JOHN MOORE.

A letter from Gibraltar, dated April 5, contains the following intelligence:—

"A hundred men, with two engineers and a detachment of artillery, were sent yesterday from this place, to take possession of an island on the opposite side of the Streights, near the Barbary coast, which has been ceded to us by the Emperor of Morocco, and which will be of the greatest utility in checking enemy's gun-boats and privateers, and affording shelter to our own vessels, particularly in bringing supplies from Barbary, as there is excellent anchorage on each side of it, and it is intended to fortify it strongly. The Emperor of Morocco is expected daily to declare war against France and Spain."

A Leeward Island Mail arrived on Thursday, brought to Falmouth by the Windsor Castle packet. The Islands have not of late been very healthy. The newly arrived regiments, the 25th and 63d, have suffered the most. The Scotch Royals had likewise been unhealthy at Tobago, and the 37th at Trinidad. Mr. Grant, the Staff Surgeon, lately died there, and Lieut.-Colonel Boggis, of the Royal West India Rangers.

By the American East Indiaman, General Clarkson, from Canton, sent into Plymouth a few days ago, the following intelligence has been received:—

She sailed from Whampoo the 8th of December, and left at that place the following English China ships, viz. the Britannia, Brunswick, Addington, Selby Castle, and three others, names not known. The Modeste, of 36 guns, was at Chumpu, waiting to take the Company's treasure.—The Albion, country ship, that took the Company's treasure at Whampoo, for the Modeste, caught fire, just as she had completed her lading, and was burnt to the water's edge.

Character of the English nation, by the celebrated Count Oxenstiern, at one time Chancellor of Sweden. "England," says he, "is most truly the Queen of Islands, the Empress of the Ocean, and the Arsenal of Neptune. It is at the same time the Peru of Europe, the Kingdom of Bacchus, the School of Epicurus, the Academy of Venus, the Country of Mars, the Residence of Minerva, the Support of Holland, the Scourge of France, the Purgatory of the Partizans of Slavery, the Paradise of the Lovers of Liberty."

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday his Majesty held a private Levee, when the following had the honour of being presented:—

Mr. Pinckney, the American Minister; Mr. Alexander, upon being appointed Consul at the Cape of Good Hope; General Sir J. Moore, upon his going abroad; General Sir G. C. B. Boughton, upon being appointed Governor of Ceylon; Admiral Lord Gambier, upon his being appointed to the command of the Channel Fleet; Mr. Rose, jun. upon his return from a special mission to America; and Admiral Bertie, upon being appointed Commander in Chief at the Cape of Good Hope.

The Bishop of Quebec took leave, previous to quitting England for Canada.

His Majesty then held a Privy Council, and gave private audiences to the Duke of Portland and the Cabinet Ministers, the American Minister, Mr. Rose, &c. and at half-past six set off on his return to Windsor.

FASHIONS FOR MAY.

Extracted from the twenty-first Number of Le Beau Monde, or Literary and Fashionable Magazine.

LADIES FULL DRESSES.

The Marmorice cap is made of white crape ornamented with a small wreath of grape vine, and a bunch of grapes on the right side—the cap is left open behind, and falls flat over the left side of the head, finished with a tassel. A plain simple dress of white net over white satin—the body and skirt is quite plain and in one. The back and bosom of the dress are square, and faced with broad white satin ribbon all round—the sleeves are short and full, and are also set into a band of white satin, this trimming is short, and trimmed with satin to correspond with the dress. A rich lace drapery hangs in careless negligence over the arm, and gives an additional grace to the elegance of the dress. Shoes white satin. Gloves white kid.

The Patmos cap has a diamond front, made chiefly of lace, satin, and white pearls—sits close to the head behind, and has three long tassels—one falls on each side of the neck, and the other, extremely long, lays on the right shoulder. The dress is composed of white crapé, and made with a half train, the back is made high and confined round the shoulders so as to avoid the necessity of a tucker. The bosom is made straight one side wraps across and meets in the centre with a pearl broach, trimmed round the neck with satin vandykes, set on a rich footing of point lace—the sleeves are made rather full on the top, open a little at the bottom, and fastened back with a pearl ornament—and below that is a trimming of lace and satin and also at the bottom, to correspond with the upper part of the dress. Primrose coloured gloves and shoes.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ON LADIES' DRESSES.

The prolongation of the inclement wintry season, and the chilling blasts of a late spring, if they have not laid a complete embargo on novelty and taste, as applicable to fashionable arrangements in dress, have yet partially blockaded not only the votaries of fashion, but also the assiduous and versatile priests and priestesses of the elegant and everchanging goddess, so that the promenades have as yet afforded but little variety.

Such is the patriotism of the day that even our "gens fabricans de mode," whether male or female, adopt their changes of fashion to our different scenes of victory, taking their names for each projected article either from the localities of past or expected triumphs. These modern priestesses of fashion therefore, like the priestesses of Delphos of old, seem, with a kind of prophetic spirit, to imagine that victories in the Levant shall grace the brow of Britannia, whilst the decorations marked by their names, shall adorn the figures of her fairest daughters. In reference therefore to these eastern regions, we find that the Patmos cap will be the vernal rage; this cap is worn with the Patmos vest, and is considered as the most superb head-dress that has ever yet been introduced to our élégantes of rank and fashion. We are sorry not to be able to give an exact description of this unrivalled cap, the various ways in which it is formed, and the tasteful diversity of the ornaments which it is composed of, will only allow us to notice it generally: its component parts are of the purest virgin crape, relieved with graceful curves of the snowey pearl, and adapted ad libitum, to the air and expression of the fair wearer's countenance.

In simple half dress the Marmorice cap and vest stand forward as candidates for public favour: from their elegance of simplicity and refined neatness, they are alike appropriate for the splendour of the ball-room, or even the more retired evenings of domestic enjoyment, and are set off with a lace drapery, either thrown across the bosom, or gracefully wound round the arms. The vest is composed of white net, over a body of satin, and the cap is of white lace, slightly wreathed with sprigs of artificial vine. The general out-door costumes in the few fine days of the last weeks, have been sprigged Mameluke muslins, ornamented with a broad ribbon of the same colour as the sprig, together with sprigged satin pelises, and the Paissane and Aurora straw hat.

GENTLEMEN'S DRESSES.

MORNING DRESS.—A bronze-coloured single breasted coat, with covered buttons—fancy toilinet waistcoat, light kerseymere pantaloons, and Swedish hussar boots.

FOR FULL DRESS.—A dark blue double-breasted coat, with gold basket buttons; no silk linings. A white waistcoat, single breast. Black silk stocking-breeches and stockings, all in one piece; no buttons at the knees, or strings. This longitudinal pantaloon terminates with round-toed Spanish leather shoes and silk strings. Great coats of dark bottle green cloth, with velvet collar and facings: no silk linings, they being exploded as completely outré. An opera hat.

CITY.

BREAD.—On Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of bread to be continued as before, viz. the quartern loaf, wheaten, to be sold for 11d. and the household 9½d.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Monday a General Court was held at the East India House, summoned on special affairs, which was very numerously attended.

After the usual forms, the Chairman (Mr. Edward Parry) stated to the Court, that a deficit of Two Millions Four Hundred Thousand Pounds existing in the present accounts of the Company, it was deemed expedient to prepare a Petition to Parliament for relief, and to submit the same for the consideration and approbation of the Proprietors; the more especially was this step necessary, as, instead of the Annual India Budget, the state of the Company's finances had been submitted to the examination of a Committee of the House of Commons, who, he had the pleasure to say, were disposed to recommend it to the House, to make an immediate payment, on account of the debt due from Government to the Company, of 1,200,000*l.* The causes of the present deficit arose, 1st, from the vast amount of the debt accumulated in India, in respect to the British territory, and the high rate of interest which such debt bears; 2d. the sums advanced for the various warlike expeditions; 3d. the deterioration occasioned in the Company by a state of European war since 1793, by freight and demurage, which, in the course of 14 years, have created an increased expence of 7,000,000*l.* By cost of the manufactures of this country exported, to the annual amount of about 1,600,000*l.* sterling, there has been an increase which has not been counter-balanced by an increase in the selling price abroad of the same goods, nor by diminution in the cost of goods purchased abroad for importation to Europe, and in diminution of profits on the Indian investments homewards. 4th, The large supplies in goods and bullion between the years 1802 and 1806, for the purpose of extending the British trade to the East-Indies, for which supplies there have not been a proportionate return, in consequence of the expences of the war. 5th, The unusual small investments from India, during the years 1803 and 1805. 6th, The great advances made out of the funds at home, between the years 1797 and 1807, for supplies in goods and bullion, which exceeded the returns from India and China by the sum of 5,691,689*l.* The Chairman then related the unquestionable ability to discharge all their present debts in England, and to repay any aid that might be afforded; for, independent of the Indian debt only, chargeable on the territories in India, on the 1st of March last, the sum total of debts, with and without interest, including the debt due to his Majesty for Customs and Excise, then amounted to 9,122,621*l.* whilst the sum owing by the Public, and other good debts and value of goods now unsold, houses, warehouses, &c. amount to 14,149,623*l.* whilst goods expected from India and China, in the course of the present year, will amount to 5,771,000*l.* which, together, would make the tangible property in England 19,420,623*l.*

After a few observations from Mr. Princep, Mr. R. Jackson, Colonel Scott, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Grant, Captains Kinmore and Smith, Mr. Kemble, Mr. Lushington, and Mr. M. Rock, the question was put, and carried unanimously.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the ships Ocean, and Sir Stephen Lushington were stationed for Madeira, Madras, and Bengal. The Travers and Earl Spencer, stationed for Madras and Bengal, were directed to touch at Madeira.—Adjourned.

ROYAL ACADEMY.

The friends of the Members were on Friday admitted to a private view of the ensuing Exhibition at this place. The Duke of Gloucester, the Marchioness of Lansdowne, Lady Bulkeley, Lady Carlisle, and a great number of well-known amateurs, were also present. Lawrence, Beechey, Owen, and Shee, appear to very great advantage. Wilkie fully maintains the high reputation which he has acquired by an admirable picture in humble life, the subject of which is Card-Players. Loutherbourg has some excellent proofs of his skill; and a Wall of Roman Soldiers, by Sir Francis Bourgeois, is a work of great merit. There are a considerable number of Portraits, most of which display all the high qualities of that province of the art, and the Exhibition altogether does honour to the talents of our countrymen. Yesterday the Royal Academicians gave their public dinner preparatory to the opening of the Exhibition on Monday; the principal persons of rank, and those most eminent for their talents, were present.

THE THEATRE.

COVENT-GARDEN.

The Two Gentlemen of Verona has been repeated, and we are sorry for it. If the Play be really Shakspeare's, and we own we believe it to be his, the revival can certainly confer no further honour upon the name of the author. All that we gather from The Two Gentlemen of Verona is, that a great Poet has produced some works which are beneath even a moderate degree of excellence; and however satisfactory such a circumstance may prove to Authors, who find themselves abused by the Critics, we do not think that the inequality of genius is a matter which needed to be illustrated by such an exemplification.

There are no less than four things in this Play which appear to us exceedingly improbable, not to say, unnatural. The first is, that the outlaws, by whom Valentine is beset in the forest, should, at first sight, elect him their Captain. The second is, that Valentine, who is a gentleman, and a man of honour, should be contented to remain among a gang of robbers, when, as Captain, he might so easily have escaped to his home at Verona. The third is, that Silvia should give to Protheus, whose presence she dislikes, and whose treachery she knows, a picture of herself, together with her recommendations of constancy in his former love; and the last is, that Valentine, at the end of the Play, when he discovers the treachery and receives the repentance of Protheus, should conclude his reconciliation by recommending Silvia to this faithless friend!

The election of Valentine, and his continuance among the Robbers, are interwoven with the play itself, and cannot be struck out: the donation of the picture too, it would be difficult to expunge: but the surrender of Silvia, which is the most revolting of all improbabilities, which is conveyed in two lines, and of which no notice appears to be taken by any of the parties present, was probably some mistaken insertion, some accidental entry, which Shakspeare never intended, and the two lines themselves have accordingly been by Mr. Kemble judiciously omitted.

This play has not even the merit of luxuriant language. Some of Shakspeare's works, however defective in interest and incident, keep their place upon the stage by the beautiful passages which they contain: but in The Two Gentlemen of Verona, it would be difficult to find any passage that excels mediocrity, except Julia's objection to Lucetta's wish of checking love:

"The current that with gentle murmur glides,
"Thou know'st, being stopt, impatiently doth rage:
"But when his fair course is not hindered,
"He makes sweet music with the enamell'd stones,
"Giving a gentle kiss to every sedge
"He overtaketh in his pilgrimage:
"And so, by many winding nooks he strays,
"With willing sport to the wild ocean."

These lines have a sweetness very Shakspearian: but they are only a single fresh spring amid the desert of two thousand lines.

We are among the most devoted admirers of Shakspeare's really great works: eternal laurels flourish over his sod, and sincerely and ardently

"We bless the shade, and bid the verdure bloom;"

but we are not prepared to hail whatever may sprout from the luxuriance of the soil, and recognise in each encumbering weed the sacred verdure of Apollo's foliage.

POLICE.

PUBLIC-OFFICE, BOW-STREET.

THE MYSTERIOUS CASE OF THE SOLDIER.—The following curious circumstance was on Tuesday investigated at this Office: J. Moody, a soldier in the 2d battalion of the Coldstream Guards, called upon Mr. Read, of the Feathers public-house, Hart-street, Covent Garden, and displayed a handful of guineas, told him he had actually more money than he knew what to do with. Mr. R. questioned him how he came by it, when he stated, that in Fleet-street, that morning, an elderly gentleman, in a Yorkshire dialect, addressed him familiarly, and asked him to hold his purse till he returned, which would be in a short time; that he then went into a house (supposed to be a brothel) with a girl; that he waited on the spot four hours; but the gentleman did not return. Mr. B. with a neighbour, then accompanied the soldier to the house described, in Black Horse-court, Fleet-street, but the people denied having seen such a person, and referred them to another house in the court, but without success. They then returned to Mr. B.'s, when he prevailed on the soldier to ascertain what sum he had, which proved to be 180 guineas, 50*l.* in bank notes, and a promissory note, due on Monday, for 50*l.* They then repaired to Mr. Wright's banking house, who refused to take charge of the money, but recommended them to apply at Bow-street, where the soldier persisted in his story, and said, he had no more money but on being searched, cash to the amount of 6*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* was found, and he was ordered to be detained till the business can be further investigated.—The soldier was put to the bar on Thursday. A person, of the name of Bowden, claimed the money, and stated, he had lost a sum similar to that which had been found on the Prisoner.

MR. READ, the Sitting Magistrate, observed, it would be necessary for Bowden to give an account of himself, and how he became possessed of the money. Bowden said, he was a journeyman carpenter, was a married man, and that he had been six years saving a part of the sum by task work: the remainder was lent him by his uncle and brother, for the purpose of taking a public house; and, at the time he lost the money, he was in treaty for the King's Arms public house, opposite Shoreditch church, for which he was to pay 550*l.* and the fixtures, &c. which would amount to 200*l.* more. That Messrs. Goodwin and Co. porter-brewers, Mr. Chevering, ale-brewer, and a distiller, was to assist him with the money he was deficient of on his dealing with them, in their respective branches of trade. He had received from Mr. Chevering a 50*l.* note, which answered the description of one found on the soldier. Last Monday was the day on which the treaty was to be carried into effect! he put 320*l.* tied up in a red handkerchief, into his pocket; in the course of the day he had been with a great number of persons, whom it was necessary for him to consult, and he drank freely, rather to excess, so much so, that he had no recollection of any occurrence that day, after nine at night, when he was at his brother's, Browne's-lane, Spital-fields. On Tuesday morning he found himself at the Three Compasses public-house, in Drury-lane, in company of a girl and a soldier; he drank purl and gin with them, which he paid for; at this time he had his money; but the purl and gin overcame him, and he lost his senses again. The Worthy Magistrate observed, he was afraid he had no recollection on the subject, and by his own account, would suppose he was always intoxicated. He alleged he was sufficiently collected on Tuesday morning to know he had the money, and that he, the girl, and soldier, went out of the house together, and he believed the prisoner to be the same soldier, but from that time he did not recollect any thing until he found himself at twelve o'clock on the same day, in Drury-lane, where he missed his money, which brought him to his senses. He was ashamed to go home, or near any of his friends, until Wednesday; and on making known his loss, he was informed, there was a soldier taken to Bow-street, and a similar sum had been found in his possession. Mr. Read ordered the business to stand over for further investigation.

PORT NEWS.

DOVER, APRIL 29.—Last night being excessively dark, an outward-bound South Sea whaler got upon the Goodwin Sand, and is gone to pieces; it is supposed the Pilot mistook the Sands; the Captain, his wife, and several of the passengers, escaped in the boat, the Pilot is supposed to have been drowned; only one person was found on the wreck (a Swedish boy), who could give no account of her name.

DEAL, APRIL 29.—Last night, about nine o'clock, the ship Adventure, Captain Parker, bound to the South Seas, ran on the North Sand Head, and overset. The Captain had just time to run into the cabin and take out his wife, and with 19 men, put off in a boat, and with only two oars reached a ship in the Downs, when the Captain finding the Pilot (Mr. Hutton), two men pressing returned towards the wreck, and succeeded in saving one of the crew, who was hanging by one of the boats filled with water which had been separated from the ship, which almost immediately went to pieces.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER NINETEEN.

ON THE INSURRECTION IN SPAIN.

In these times it has become a matter of difficulty to form even a conjecture as to the probable result of any great political event. The Emperor of the French has so long been in the habit of causing the most extraordinary changes in the most sudden manner, sometimes by his intrigues, sometimes by his arms, and sometimes involuntarily by the effect which his measures produce upon the minds of neighbouring nations, that our political sagacity has now become a bye-word, and our calculation is but the cast of a die. The regions of ambition seem no where impassable to him: he treads no known road, he seeks no beaten track; but strikes through all the obstacles of impeding nature, and profits by the very hindrances that hostile caution may oppose to his career.

Knowing then how much his ambition seeks, and knowing that what his ambition seeks his genius procures: we cannot flatter ourselves with the hope that much benefit will arise to this country from the late insurrection in Spain. It has become exceedingly difficult to decide with any rational confidence, upon the cause of this insurrection: and to him who is absolutely ignorant of causes, all future effects must appear enveloped in darkness and doubt. Don Manuel Godoy, who has long been the creature of France, has been loaded with disgrace: and yet the interest of the French appears to have suffered in no single particular. It has been supposed on the other hand that this Don Manuel Godoy is nothing but the instrument of Bonaparte's ambition, who for the sake of still further securing his interest with the French Court, has consented to undergo a temporary degradation in his own country: and it even has been believed by many speculators, that he advised the King of Spain to emigrate only in order that the vacancy of the throne might afford to the French Emperor an excuse, however specious, for seizing the royal power. This opinion is corroborated, we must confess, by the general tenor of Don Manuel's conduct; for if ever there was a person adapted by his address and by his disregard of virtue, for all the corrupt purposes of an ambitious employer, such a person is apparently this Spaniard. He studied the military science early in life, and entered into the Body Guards. He was presented by one of his relations to the Queen, who, pleased with the elegance of his person, procured for him a commission of importance. Count Florida Blanca, who was at that time the Prime Minister, discovering that he had a great knowledge of the politics of Foreign Courts, very soon began to treat him with distinction: and the favour of the King presently created him a Grandee, Duke of Alcudia, and Commander-in-Chief of all the armies of Spain. On the disgrace of the Prime Minister, Godoy became the agent of the peace between France and Spain, and the memory of this event was perpetuated by his assumption of the title of Prince of the Peace. But all this was not sufficient to complete his almost unexampled good fortune: the King granted him the hand of the daughter of the infant Don Louis, and he became allied to the Blood Royal. The general report of this man's character is, that he was proud, yet venal, avaricious, and yet dissolute: a woman of the name of La Tudo lived with him as a mistress. Now, although exalted situation almost universally exposes men to the shafts of envy, and though in the defamation of the Prince of the Peace motives of interest, as well as of malice might easily be supposed to weigh heavily with the minds of his enemies, yet we have always been inclined to think that amid all the shamelessness of slander, and amid all the inaccuracy of common fame, there is generally some sort of reality, some foundation of truth, however narrow, on which the towering fabric of falsehood must rear itself. An old proverb says, that there is no smoke without some fire: and it seems not unreasonable to believe, after making every allowance for the enmity and selfishness of a hostile faction, that Don Manuel Godoy is one of those designing, supple, ambitious, statesmen, who, bred by the unnatural heats of a nation, feed upon foulness, and riot in the corruption that surrounds them. Such a man appears to be an instrument peculiarly well-suited for the purposes of Bonaparte: and until the ultimate developement of the French plans shall have manifested the fortune of Godoy, we shall have little ground for condemning as absurd the ideas of those, who maintain the probability of a collusion between the Emperor of France and the Prince of the Peace.

On the other hand some persons have supposed, that the insurrection has had for its object the complete destruction of the French influence in Spain: that the nobles, weary of a yoke so oppressive and so dishonourable, have determined to govern for themselves: and that the persons who have succeeded to places of power are likely, from the principles which they have always professed, to oppose the schemes of Bonaparte with all their heart and might.

But is it not possible that reasoners who go so far for the motives of human action, and seek in one country for a cause to which they may ascribe the effects that they behold in another, deceive themselves by the extent of their sagacity, and by shooting beyond the mark, commit as material an error as if their wit had fallen short of its destination? For our own parts, we venture to suggest another hypothesis on this question, which appears to us to afford a much more simple and satisfactory explanation of the recent events, than either of the suppositions before stated, although we are far from declaring those former suppositions to be absurd, and although we confess that our own view of the case affords very little room for that sublimity of speculation and range of conjecture with which the public is so often amused by our cotemporary writers.

In short then, it appears to us, that the the Spanish people have been instigated to this riot, by no scheme of foreign intrigue originating with the Prince of Peace, by no fear of foreign influence operating upon their minds, but by that angry spirit which so frequently actuates the mob of a country to rise for the overthrow of great men personally obnoxious, and of domestic measures politically disagreeable. If we consider the Spanish Insurrection merely in this light, we shall find nothing irreconcileable in the various accounts that have reached us. The degradation of Godoy, and the favourable disposition manifested by the new King to the French, though they seem strange and contradictory events according to the hypotheses of those who refer every thing to foreign causes, will appear perfectly consistent on the admission of a domestic inducement. However, we beg to be understood, that although we are not inclined fully to coincide with those who attribute every thing to French intrigue, or with those who attribute every thing to the fear of French power; yet we do not by any means proceed to the length of denying that such causes may have operated: and we offer our own view of the case, not as a decision upon the question, but merely as a probable conjecture.

But whatever may be the real causes of this Insurrection, and however difficult it may be found exactly to declare any of the results which it will produce, we think it by no means equally difficult to point out some of the desired effects which it will not produce. It will not produce any material advantage either to the Continent in general, or to England in particular. If the disposition of Spain were friendly to this country, of which we see no sort of token, yet her power is totally inadequate to our service; much more then must it be inadequate to the restoration of that tranquillity, which seems to be attainable only by the overthrow of Bonaparte's domination. The armies of the French are on the frontiers, nay, they are in the very territories of Spain: the Spanish troops are at a distance from home, employed in Germany for the service of French allies.

Under all these circumstances, what may we gather from the late events in Spain? Not a hope for the countries of Europe, but a lesson for their Rulers and Philosophers. Spain which was once a State proudly pre-eminent among the nations of the civilized world: Spain, which once was equal to the French Empire in military greatness, as she was allied to them by her royal blood; Spain, which was once the mistress of the seas, and the rival of England herself—Spain, that gallant country, the early abode of all that was glorious in feeling, in courage, and in wisdom—the seat of Chivalry, the flower of Europe—is fallen for ever from her high estate; the pride of her national character, the strength of her armies, the power of her fleets, the hereditary dignity of her Bourbons, all, all, exist but as shadows, the ghosts of a grandeur departed!

Such must ever be the fate of those countries, whose greatness rises from accidental causes, and whose power is but the overgrown might of a few; while the nations that give to each individual alike an interest in the safety of the whole, and by equal laws and encouragements call forth and reward at every period of their history, a constant succession of talent and virtue, may reasonably hope to stand firm against the tide of ages, although, as it fares with England at the present moment, the world should rise in arms against them!

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XIX.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In the thirteenth Number of our Paper we presented our Readers with a letter from a person of fashion in London to his friend, a young gentleman of family, who resides in the country: and we made a promise of inserting, from time to time, such of his epistles on similar subjects as we could procure, with the assurance of authenticity. We now give a letter on the House of Commons.

DEAR R——,

You wish to hear something of the House of Commons: expecting, doubtless, a great deal of panegyric on a body which has boasted so many illustrious men, and of which you will yourself be probably a member before you take your father's place in the Upper House. I dare say you think that an institution, on which the interests of the people so materially depend, and which, indeed, is the great distinction that marks the superiority of the British Constitution over every other, is conducted in such a manner as to impress the mind with a feeling of veneration at once for the majesty of the people, for the worth of their representatives, and for the wisdom of our ancestors who framed such a branch of the Legislature. My dear R. you are quite wrong if you fancy any such thing. You see, indeed, the Speaker looking very grave, and even wise: for who would not look wise with a wig at which the friseurs of the time of King Charles the Second would have started in amazement? And below you see some clerks, quietly sitting at a table in front of the Speaker's chair: but other object of dignity there is none, unless by chance the Master of the Rolls be at his place, who always sits in his wig and gown. The rest of the Members amuse themselves as they please, till the very moment of entering the House, so that when they appear in their places, their boots and round hats give an inexpressible air of graceful negligence and ease to the naturally formal chapel of St. Stephen. They even sit with their hats on their heads; despising those old-fashioned forms which our ancestors denominated by the name of good breeding. For as the Members of this House for the most part are men who keep the best company, and as no good company now-a-days would tolerate what was once called good breeding, many gentlemen, out of mere compliment to the fashionable women of their acquaintance, have thrown off such formal customs, and introduce the manners of the ladies who lead the ton into the councils of the men who direct the nation. By an easy transition, the enemies of old breeding have become the enemies of old morality: and unless the House of Commons at large shall make some rule to check the innovations of some of its Members, or unless their Constituents shall laugh them out of their stable-jackets, we shall hope to see modern manners and modern morals at last understood as well on the benches of the House of Commons, as even on Newmarket heath, or at the fives-court for sparring.

The Members employ themselves in different ways according to their peculiar tastes. Some go up stairs into the long galleries that are put up on each side like those of a church, and are lulled to sleep by the sonorous soporifics of the vast debate: not a few, removed to a convenient distance, enjoy all the pleasures of friendly conversation; and in common with the strangers who come only as visitors, determine to make themselves happy, notwithstanding the frequent hints which the Speaker throws out in many expressive little phrases, such as, Order in the House! —Order at the Bar!—Order under the Gallery!—From the inattention with which many gentlemen receive these hints, even while some Cabinet Minister is speaking, I have sometimes been tempted to conceive, that they had the presumption to fancy their own conversation as beneficial to the country as the speech of the Right Hon. Gentleman or Noble Lord who might be on his legs. But a man may attend his duty at the House of Commons, without attending his duty in the House of Commons: and this desirable object he effects, by going up stairs to Bellamy's, where he may eat and drink as long as he chuses, so he be but sober enough to get down stairs when the division is called. A man who did not know the ways of the place, would be apt to imagine that by not hearing the arguments advanced in the debate, a Member might chance to be incapacitated for giving his vote in a proper way: but in order to obviate that difficulty, those Members who understand their business well, make up their minds about their vote before the matter is discussed at all. They know that the wisdom of any individual is weak: that the more heads there are, the greater is likely to be the sum of good counsel: and therefore, modestly distrusting their own capacity, they always take care to vote on that side where the majority of opinions demonstrates that the truth must be situate. A man accustomed to the place will also be careful at what moment he leaves the House. It would not be prudent, unless he meant to make an evening of it, and stay away from the counting of the House till the divison, it would not, I say, be prudent for him to go up to his wine, while any thing entertaining was before the Speaker: but when a dull doctor or a country gentleman gets up, and attempts to declaim or to crack jokes, then, then, the experienced Member will retire to Bellamy's, and make amends by wine for the absence of wit.

What I have been telling you hitherto applies to those Members who go to the House for the mere purpose of voting: but there are some who have a taste for politics, and they stay quietly in their places and attend to what goes forward, in order that they may do some good to their country, and make a respectable figure at the county meetings. And there are others who follow debating as a trade, and who of course are obliged to be constantly in the shop. Such are some of the Ministers, and other ingenious men, lacking advancement: all these are constantly on the watch for the faults of their adversaries, in order that from those faults they may prove their own superior title to the sweets of office. These are the people that protract the debates till three or four o'clock in the morning, and instead of showing how the country might be managed right, show only where their adversaries have managed it wrong.

You will observe, on entering the House, a remarkable partiality which is entertained by many worthy men for that side of the building which is the right-hand side of the Speaker. When I first came to town I thought it seemed very odd that so many more people should sit on that side than on the other, when the places did not seem at all warmer, nor the seats at all softer. Nay I heard, that though a set of men, who had once been Ministers and sate on that side too, were all gone over to the opposite benches, this party that loved the right-hand places, gave up even the pleasure of associating with their old companions, and unaccountably staid behind. I asked my father what was the reason of this, and he answered: Those are called the Treasury Benches. I did not understand his answer at the time: but when I had lived a little longer in the world, I acknowledged that it was quite satisfactory. Believe me, dear R. your's always, C.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

SPAIN.

MADRID, MARCH 26.—Extract of a Letter from an Officer in the French army:—"On the 23d, we appeared before Madrid, and entered the city the same evening. An immense concourse of people came out of the city to meet us. The whole army was collected together in the finest order. The Grand Duke received them, amidst the acclamations of the Spaniards. He afterwards made is entry into Madrid, preceded by the Imperial Guard on horseback, and by a numerous Staff, and followed by all the cavalry, and the first division of infantry, under the command of General Mennier. The two divisions remained encamped on the surrounding heights. The streets and balconies were crouded with inhabitants, and the Spanish military who expressed great satisfaction at the arrival of the French. On the 24th, the Prince of Asturias, proclaimed King by the natives made his public entry on horseback. He is a fine man, and has an agreeable countenance; he went to the Royal Palace, which is not far from the Palace of the Admiral. The Police of the city is maintained by patroles, which are commanded by two officers, one French, and the other Spanish, to prevent all disputes that might arise from the difference of languages."

Supplement to the Madrid Gazette of the 22d of March.

His Majesty has issued the following Decree:—"Although Don Pedro Cevallos, my first Secretary of State and Dispatches, has sent in his resignation for different reasons which he has stated, I have not received his resignation, because it is proved to me, that though he married a cousin-german of the Prince of the Peace, he never participated in the projects and unjust designs which are supposed to have been conceived by that man, and upon which I have ordered judicial enquiries; which shews in him a noble heart, faithful to his Sovereign, and a servant of whom I will not deprive myself. My will is, that this order be published and made known to my subjects.

"Aranjuez, March 21. I, THE KING.

"To the Marquis Ceballero."

MARCH 30.—The army is looked upon here with a very favourable eye.—Last Sunday the Military Mass, at which the Grand Duke of Berg and the French General assisted, was very brilliant, and produced a deep sensation.

King Charles and the Queen are still at Aranjuez; the Prince of Asturias and the Queen of Etruria are at Madrid.

LOWER SAXONY.

HAMBURGH, APRIL 22.—This morning all the Spanish troops which still remained in Hamburgh, and its environs, received orders to march to Altona, and go into quarters there, till further orders. A detachment of them arrived to day at seven o'clock, at the gate of the city; the Danish soldiers on duty refused them admittance, upon which the Spanish Officer who commanded them, waited upon the President of the Senate of Altona, who told him, he had no orders from his Sovereign to receive them; and that he had several days before made the same declaration to the French Commandant at Hamburgh, General Damas. The Spanish Officer then said, that his orders to enter were positive, and that he must oppose force to force. The President still persisting in his refusal, the Spaniards entered with fixed bayonets, and soon after were billetted on the inhabitants.

APRIL 25.—The Prince of Ponte Corvo has had frequent conferences with the new King of Denmark, in which he expressed to him his surprise at the defective state of the military preparations in Zealand, even for the defence of the country against England and Sweden; and also at the little progress made in the measures necessary to co-operate with the French and Spaniards in the invasion of Sweden. He left Zealand because he did not think himself safe there, if an attack should be immediately made by the combined British and Swedish fleets. He also left his head-quarters at Odensee in Fuhuen, and retired to Celding, in Jutland. He is said to have transmitted to Bonaparte some strong remonstrances on the impracticability of conveying his army to Sweden, without the most imminent danger of its being destroyed by the British and Swedish maritime force. But all the answer he received from his Master was, that he expected he would send him no more dispatches unless they were dated from Stockholm.

SWEDEN.

GOTTENBURGH, APRIL 27.—A brisk cannonading was distinctly heard here the whole of the night of Monday last, which proves to have been an attack made by the English sloop Daphne, and two others, upon the harbour of Flestrand, in Jutland, out of which they cut ten vessels laden with corn and provisions, destined for Norway, and this afternoon arrived with their prizes here.

APRIL 25.—Our accounts from Norway to-day informs us that the Swedish army has advanced as far as Kongvinger, which is within ten Swedish, or 70 English miles, of Christiana, and that they have possessed themselves, by storm, of two essential forts in that neighbourhood, in which they took 500 prisoners, with very little loss on their side.

Some travellers have arrived within these few days from Hamburgh, who bring news down to the 15th inst. They say that 2000 French troops have entered Altona, and that they are in full possession of Holstein, but that none of them have yet come over to Zealand. A report prevailed when the trav-soldiers left the other side, that a great part of the Danish flotilla and transports had been destroyed by the English ships in the Belts; but of this we rather doubt, as no official accounts have yet reached us.

STOCKHOLM, APRIL 19.—By a report made by Rear-Admiral Baron Cederstrom, Commander-in-Chief of the Swedish Squadron, dated at sea, April 9, the said squadron put to sea on the 30th of last month, and stood for Bornholm, and afterwards for Rugen, where it was joined by the Swedish frigates Chapman and Jarremas, and the brig Dolphin.

On the 4th of April the Jarremas frigate took a Danish merchant ship; and a Prussian vessel had been taken by the Chapman on the 9th of April. At the date of the report the squadron was cruizing near the Isle of Moen.

PROCLAMATION

OF GENERAL ARMFELDT, ON ENTERING NORWAY.

INHABITANTS OF NORWAY,

The Danish Government has declared War against Sweden without any cause or provocation on her part, and has increased the calamities which affected the North, and spontaneously submitted to a foreign yoke. The Swedish troops, therefore, enter your country according to the laws of war, and in order to prevent hostilities from being committed on their own country. But the laws of war are carried into execution only by soldiers. The principal inhabitants of the towns and country, if they excite no disturbances, shall enjoy tranquillity and protection.

The Swedish Soldier, celebrated for order and discipline, respects the personal safety and property of the unarmed; and should Providence bless his Majesty's arms, the army under my command, so far from proving hurtful to your different trades, shall open your ports to commerce and importation, quicken your industry, and secure in the North an asylum for loyalty and honour. AUGUSTUS MAURICE ARMFELDT.

OFFICIAL REPORT FROM THE WESTERN ARMY IN SWEDEN.

"The enemy, about 6000 men, including the garrison of Kongwinger, is driven beyond Glommen. Here they had intrenched themselves, and taken a very strong position, where they bravely opposed our attack for three hours. This place was so strong, that had I known what force it contained, I would not have attacked it with so small a body of troops as I employed for the purpose. The chief Adjutant Baron Ankersvard and Major Hard, of the Upland Regiment, stormed the first redoubt at the moment that the first division of Baron Cederstrom's column appeared on the opposite side to take the enemy in the rear. This column had encountered most serious difficulties, having been marched over floating pieces of ice sawed asunder by the enemy, and through very deep snow; but Baron Cederstrom's skill and intrepidity overcame all obstacles; and the very excellent conduct of Baron Ankersvard and Major Hard, decided the affair to the honour of your Majesty's troops.—Our loss is not inconsiderable; however, it does not exceed 100 men in killed and wounded. We have taken about the same number, and three officers, prisoners, besides numerous armed peasants. Their loss in killed and wounded must have been very great, to judge from those we see left on the field, and in the neighbouring woods. By well concerted preparations for retreat, which the situation of the fort made very easy, their cannon were carried off; but the stores and ammunition waggons fell into our hands. I shall not fail to lay before your Majesty, as soon as possible, a more circumstantial report; but we are now all occupied in securing the advantages which this victory has afforded us.

"My comrades have not only done their duty, but braved such difficulties of both nature, season, and arms, that I feel it my duty, without loss of time, to do them justice, and to lay at your Majesty's feet the first laurel gained by your Western Army, after having offered our humble and sincere thanks to the Lord of Hosts.

"Serjeant Ehlund, who much distinguished himself in the affair, and was slightly wounded, is the bearer of this report.

"G. M. ARMFELDT, Commander in Chief of the Western Army.

"Head-quarters, Lier upon Glommen, April 19, 3 A. M."

"P. S. Just as I was about to dispatch the courier, I heard my men had found a cannon that has been dug out of the snow. this manner they have left behind them two more.

"The report of Lieut.-Col. Laugerbring is just come in, with account of his having taken the fort of Blackiers, and made the Commandant prisoner—The fort is in the best condition, and is the very inlet to Christiana, to which place I mean to proceed over Mangel-fjell, when I have secured this position.

"G. M. ARMFELDT."

Extract of a private letter from Gottenburgh, dated April 30. —"We hear that in the action near Glommen, Gen. Armfeldt had his General's Staff shot away.—Report says, that we have taken the forts of Iggle and Ahlanger, with 500 prisoners."

FINLAND.

ABO, MARCH 11.—"This day our formal entrance into Abo took place, together with the act of taking possession of this Grand Duchy, in the name of our sublime Monarch. The Governor, the Dignitaries of the Church, the Deputies of the Nobility, the higher Public Functionaries, and the Municipality, at the head of the collected citizens, met us before the town, and received us with the most decided marks of pleasure. Provisions of every kind, according to the information just received, are here in great quantities; and 200 cannon, as well as 90 pieces in Tangerhut, are become our booty. Yesterday evening we received intelligence of the capture of Biorneborg. The remains of the Swedish army, commanded by General Klingsper, which have been thus far driven back, have suffered much in the defence of Biorneborg. They have lost a Colonel, 3 Staff-Officers, 9 Officers, 350 men, and the baggage, and have been forced to retreat to Wasa, where, however, he will find he has been flanked by the column of Gen. Tutschkow, and he will have consequently no other resource remaining than to surrender, since the passage across the Gulph of Bothnia into Sweden is impeded by the floating ice: and in retreating by Borneo, along the uninhabited coast of East Bothnia, all his men must necessarily perish with hunger.

"Sweaborg is still wanting to us. Should this be taken also, the conqueror may then fairly undertake the capture of Gibraltar; for there exists only two such fortresses, raised by nature, which can resist the modern art of war."

DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN, APRIL 16.—We learn here, to day, that a regiment of infantry and a division of dragoons yesterday successfully crossed the Belt, in sixty transport vessels, and are landed in Zealand.

Within a few days, a report has been spread that our army in Norway has made an incursion into Sweden, driven back a corps of the enemy, and set fire to some of his magazines. To this it is added, that a considerable body of French troops are arrived, in Dutch vessels, in a harbour of Norway.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, MARCH 30.—According to a publication which has been made in Hungary, the line of Austrian troops which has been formed on the frontiers of Turkey, begins at the west, towards the limits of Turkish Croatia, thence it extends along the Save and Danube, to Transylvania; it turns then towards the North, passing by Buckharne, and joins the frontiers of Gallacia. As the extent which has been given to this line demands an army more strong than that which has been hitherto devoted to this object, fresh regiments have been sent to complete the force. General Duka is arrived at Bannat, and has established his head-quarters at Temeswar. Field Marshal Bellegarde is expected immediately.

BANKS OF THE DANUBE, APRIL 1.—The last accounts from Istria state, that General Marmont is marching to the coast with the greatest part of the French troops in Dalmatia; the motive of this movement is yet unknown.

SUABIA.

STUTGARD, APRIL 1.—The last letters from Vienna assure us, that the officers who are to form the Etat Major of the Austrian Army, collected on the frontiers of Turkey, have just been definitively named by the Emperor, on the presentation of the Archduke Charles. The command in chief is given to Field Marshal Bellegarde, the second to General Duka, and the chief of the Etat-Major-General to General Stuttenheim.

NUREMBERG, APRIL 8.—Our Gazette contains the following article:—"Letters from some Officers in the corps of General Davoust mention, that that corps has received orders to hold itself in readiness to march, as it will soon break up for Southern Russia. The army will assemble at Astracan, and march through Persia for the East Indies."

ITALY.

VENICE, APRIL 4.—The Italian Newspapers advise from Zara, that the French Fleet, commanded by Admiral Gantheume, which arrived at Corfu the 22d of Feb. set sail again the following day, but left there the ship Commerce de Paris, to refit. The fleet consists of 19 ships of war, it returned afterwards to Corfu, and set sail from thence again the 16th March, destined as we understand, for Morea.

MARCH 26.—The day before yesterday a French cutter arrived here, with dispatches for the Governor-General, and immediately afterwards, such movements were observed, as give reason to suppose that the small Italian squadron which is ready in the arsenal, and all the Russian frigates and corvettes which are here, will sail to-day or to-morrow. The cutter has proceeded to Trieste, probably to carry dispatches to the three Russian ships of the line and three frigates which lie there. In all probability, we shall soon witness important events in the Adriatic. The combined Rochefort and Toulon squadrons are already off the coast of Dalmatia, and there are even reports of a loss which the English have suffered near the Island of Curzola.

ROME, MARCH 30.—On the 27th inst. General Miollis published the following Order of the Day:—

"His Majesty the Emperor and King Napoleon testifies his satisfaction with the conduct of the hitherto Papal troops. These soldiers shall not in future receive orders either from priests or woman. Soldiers should only be commanded by soldiers. They may also be assured that they shall no more return under the command of priests. The Emperor and King will give them Generals to conduct them, who shall be worthy their bravery."

TURKEY.

CONSTANTINOPLE, MARCH 6.—The armistice between the Porte and Russia is prolonged for two months. Both powers are already agreed with respect to the principal articles of the peace, through the mediation of the French Ambassador, General Sebastiani; and the remaining difficulties will be adjusted within the space of two months. The Porte has consented that the French troops shall march through its territory, and will give other proofs of its esteem and friendship for the great Emperor Napoleon.

Within a short time, several couriers have been sent off to Persia and the East Indies; the greater part of them by the French Ambassador, General Sebastiani, who, it is understood, has received some very valuable presents from the Grand Signior, as a testimony of his esteem. It is also understood that the Sultan, after some consultations in the Divan, has consented to the passage of a French army through Albania, which is destined against the East Indies.

STATE PAPERS.

RUSSIA.

PETERSBURGH, APRIL 2.—On the part of our Court, the following memorable Declaration has been published, in consequence of the arrest of the Russian Ambassador at Stockholm:

"The Emperor has informed all the Cabinets of Europe and his own subjects of his constant endeavours to inforce his rights, grounded on subsisting treaties with Sweden, and to obtain by virtue thereof the co-operation of his Swedish Majesty against England. After having pursued these measures for several months, his Imperial Majesty was concerned to find, that while he was endeavouring to preserve a good understanding between Russia and Sweden, the latter preferred the friendship of England, his enemy.

"His Imperial Majesty has not concealed from the King of Sweden, or all Europe, that the welfare of his people required of him to employ all the means which Providence has bestowed on him for the safety and welfare of his Empire.

"Faithful to his system of moderation, his Majesty declared to the King of Sweden his readiness to convert the step which he had reluctantly taken, into a measure of prudence, if the King would immediately, and without delay, perform his engagements, and co-operate with him and the King of Denmark to shut the Baltic against the English fleets.

"The silence observed by the King of Sweden, the accounts given in public papers of the conclusion of a treaty, by which subsidies, a fleet, and part of the land forces of Great Britain were placed at the disposal of that Monarch; in short, every thing bespoke the real sentiments of that Prince, with regard to Russia; every thing clearly shewed, that his Imperial Majesty could not expect any favourable change of the sentiments of the King of Sweden, and that it was time for his Imperial Majesty, to secure his subjects against the evils which had been secretly planned against them. His Majesty was accordingly compelled to alter the character of his measure.

"He has received intelligence that his Ambassador in Stockholm, on the 20th of February (3d March) was put in a state of arrest by the King's order, that all the persons belonging to the Russian Embassy were also confined in one house by his command, that the said Monarch had even proceeded so far as to order all the Papers and Letters of the Embassy to be taken under seal, and the whole mission to be guarded by the military; his Majesty has therefore to complain of an act of violence committed against his prerogative and the dignity of his Crown, which concerns all other Powers as well as himself. The diplomatic body resident in Stockholm, was so perfectly sensible of the truth of this assertion, that it immediately protested against an act of violence unprecedented in Europe, with the exception of Turkey.

"The Emperor might use reprisals, but he has preferred to direct his Ministers to increase the attention which they have always paid to the Swedish Ambassador, who is still in Petersburgh, and to take care, that, should he choose to take his departure from hence, he may not experience any difficulty or unpleasant proceedings on his journey.

"His Imperial Majesty hereby informs all European Powers, that, from this moment, he considers the former Swedish Finland, which his troops have not been able to subdue, but in consequence of several actions, as a Province conquered by his arms, and that he incorporates it for ever with his Empire. His Majesty expects that Providence will continue to bless his arms in this war, and assist him to remove the evil from the frontier of his Empire, to which the enemies of Russia endeavour to expose him.

"Given in Petersburgh, March 16, 1808."

PORTUGAL.

PROCLAMATION BY GENERAL JUNOT.

The General in Chief of the Army of Portugal, understanding that many soldiers and inhabitants of the kingdom of Portugal have suffered themselves to be deluded by false Proclamations, published by the English, to procure soldiers, of which the British squadron is so much in need, and wishing to prevent the misery of those who may hereafter become the victims of the perfidious insinuations of the Commanders of that squadron, it is decreed:—

I. That all communication between the kingdom of Portugal and the vessels belonging to the English Squadron, be expressly prohibited; and that should any vessel or boat, of any description, approach the coast throughout all Portugal, under any pretext whatever, (even with a flag of truce,) it is ordered, that all Officers commanding batteries or forts, do fire on them; any Officer who shall suffer a vessel or boat to approach the shore, shall be tried by a Court Martial and broke.

II. Any individual detected in endeavouring to get on board an English vessel under any pretext whatever, shall be brought before a Military Committee, and condemned to six months imprisonment, or to death, according to the case.

III. Any master or owner of a boat, or other individual, who shall be proved to have facilitated the passage of any person to the English Squadron, shall be brought before a Military Committee, and tried as an accomplice with the enemy, and as an instigator and spy, and be punished with death.

IV. Any individual convicted of exciting the Soldiers of the French and Portuguese army, to desertion, to any Power whatever, will be punished by death as a crimp traitor.

V. Any person who shall give information of a master of a boat having conducted any one to the English squadron, or any person using endeavours to get there, through the intervention of a crimp or spy, on the fact being proved, shall receive as a reward the boat and one hundred cruzados for any individual, or two hundred for a crimp or spy.

VI. All the property of those who have quitted Portugal up to this moment, and are gone off to the enemy's squadron, shall be sequestered, if they do not return before the 20th inst. The Magistrates in each department will examine the respective inhabitants, and take a list of those persons who have fled, and transmit the same to the Intendant General of the Police.

VII. The French Military Penal Code from this day will be put in execution against the Portuguese Army, agreeable to which, every deserter on being arrested will be punished with death.

VIII. The Secretary of State, the Commanders of the French, Spanish, and Portuguese armies, all Magistrates and Justices of every description, are charged with the execution of this Decree, throughout the kingdom, and to make the same generally known; any boats found without a copy of this Edict, shall be seized and sold for the benefit of the captor.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, MAY 2.

Lord Ellenborough brought in a Bill for the relief of persons confined for small debts. His Lordship said it was not his intention to go into a detailed description of it at present, though it might be as well to premise that the provisions were only meant to extend to individuals whose debts, independent of costs, did not exceed 20*l*. His Lordship said it was never intended, by the Constitution of the country, that a man should be imprisoned for debt all his life time, or that the power of punishing should exceed the enormity of the offences, whether civil or criminal. He should therefore propose that every individual who shall have been charged in execution twelve calendar months, for a debt or debts not exceeding 20*l*. shall, on making application to that effect, be entitled to his free discharge; but at the same time he should not hold himself entirely purged from his debt, as his goods and future property should still be considered liable to answer the demands of his creditor, though his person was for ever free, as to the matter for which he was discharged. His Lordship admitted, that what he proposed entrenched upon the law of the land, but he hoped it would ultimately prove beneficial both to debtor and creditor. —His Lordship added, that he did not propose to extend the Bill either to Scotland or Ireland; but if its beneficial consequences should be apparent, it was open for any Noble Lord to propose the extension.

His Lordship's Bill was then read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

The routine business was gone through, and the House adjourned,

TUESDAY, MAY 3.

Lord Hawkesbury laid on the table several papers, in return to an Address of their Lordships. We understood them to be the accounts last moved for by Lord Sidmouth, relative to the Danish ships and prisoners. They were ordered to be printed.

Lord Moira presented a petition from the Debtors in the Gaol of Leicester, praying for relief. It was ordered to lie on the table; after which his Lordship expressed the pleasure with which he had heard of the Bill introduced the day before, for the benefit of this unfortunate description of persons.—Adjourned,

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4.

Heard Counsel in continuation of the Roxburgh Appeal.

Lord Hawkesbury presented some further returns relative to the Danish vessels detained prior to the declaration of hostilities. They were ordered to be printed.

On the motion of the Lord Chancellor, the consideration of the Banbury Peerage, was fixed for to-morrow se'nnight,—Adjourned,

THURSDAY, MAY 5.

The Irish Spirit Drawback Suspension Bill, and several Private Bills, were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

Lord Sidmouth gave notice, that he should bring on his motion relative to the Danish Vessels, to-morrow se'nnight, for which day the house was ordered to be summoned.

Lord Grenville rose to postpone his notice of motion relative to the Catholics' Petition, which now stood for the 13th instant, and moved that the House should be summoned for the 27th instant, and that the order for the 13th be discharged.

Lord Grenville then reminded their Lordships that he had given notice of a motion for the revocation of the Orders in Council, He would not, however, bring that forward so early as he intended. It was rumoured, and he should be most happy to find the report correct, that in consequence of the prospect of a satisfactory adjustment with America, his Majesty's Ministers had it actually in contemplation to rescind those orders of their own accord. He did not expect nor call for any explanation from them at this moment on this important topic; but be[illegible] obvious that such a proceeding should rather be [illegible] Administration than the result of the in[illegible] he thought it his duty to delay the motion for a reasonable period, without relinquishing his original intention, should his expectations be disappointed.

Lord Hawkesbury said, that it was unnecessary for him now to advert at any length to what had fallen from the Noble Lord, nor would he enter into the question of the present state of the discussions with America. The Noble Lord had properly remarked that he did not expect any such explanation at present. He was, however, anxious that this silence should not be construed into an admission that there was an intention of revoking the Orders in Council.

The House then went into a Committee on the Scotch Judicature Bill. A long and general discussion took place on the Preamble, and several of the clauses, when the Chairman was ordered to report progress.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 6.

Several witnesses were examined in support of Bland's Divorce Bill; and the further hearing of evidence was fixed for Tuesday se'nnight.

The Irish Spirit Drawback Suspension Bill was read a second time.

Their Lordships then resolved into a Committee on the Scotch Judicature Bill, various amendments, but chiefly of a verbal description, were proposed by the Lord Chancellor, and adopted; and several of the clauses upon which discussion arose, were postponed for further consideration.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, MAY 2.

Sir Samuel Romilly took the usual oaths and his seat.

Mr. Baker presented a petition from certain Gentlemen and others, stating that a combination existed amongst certain persons to raise the price of Postage, to the great expence and inconvenience of Travellers, and praying that the House would take the same into consideration.

Mr. Cowper said, he would oppose any measure to interfere in the business. There was a great rise in the price of hay and corn since the last price of posting took place, and there was never wanting a competition to prevent the public from being imposed upon or injured.

The Petition was ordered to be laid on the table.

A petition was presented from the Corporation of Worcester, praying that the Reversion Place Prohibitory Bill should be carried into a law.

Mr. Biddulph gave notice that he would move, on Wednesday, for the opinion of the Attorney and Solicitor General in 1712, respecting the Rents and Fines of the Demised Revenues of the Crown.

MALT DUTY.

Mr. Huskisson said, he rose for the purpose of moving for leave to bring in a Bill for the better Collection of the Duty payable on Malt. It was necessary, he observed, to provide a check and to take care that the duty should be paid on the stock on the premises of the maltster, who must keep an account of the quantity of barley he receives. It was necessary also to make a provision to oblige persons to give security for the duty, as it was the practice of some inferior maltsters to get the barley on credit from the farmers, and to sell the malt before the time elapsed for collecting the duty, or remove it to some other place. It was therefore intended to collect the duty within six weeks, or to extend the time where security was given. This provision was necessary to guard against fraud, and to protect the public revenue. For these reasons he moved for leave to bring in a Bill, which was granted accordingly.

The Committee, on hearing the evidence on the Orders of Council, was deferred, on the motion of Mr. Tierney, till Wednesday next.

LOCAL MILITIA.

Lord Castlereagh said, he wished to observe, that there were one or two measures proposed to him, which, with others, he intended to move in the Committee on the Local Militia Bill. These alterations would narrow the discussion on the general principle of the Bill, and which, he had no doubt, would meet with the unanimous concurrence of the House.—The first alteration which he thought desirable, was to give an exception to those persons serving in the Militia by Substitute, or who had paid a penalty in lieu of personal service, and he thought it fair to make the exemption equivalent to that under the existing Militia Act. He thought it also proper to exempt the balloting men serving by ballot, or for a number of years to be hereafter specified, and not for an indefinite period, until the w[illegible] of the parish was balloted. He would also move a clause in the Committee, for the purpose of enabling any Volunteer corps, with their Officers, to transfer their services to the Local Militia, and that the Officers should retain their rank, and the whole have the same exemptions which they enjoy at present. Another regulation which he would propose in the Committee, to facilitate the service of persons who might find it necessary for their avocations to transfer their service from one county to another, or who, if they changed their residence, might avoid the inconvenience of serving in the county where they were originally balloted, by serving in that where they resided. It was also his intention to propose, that the families of persons balloted into the Local Militia should, if they were poor, have the same allowance during the absence of the father of the family, that was given to the Volunteers when on permanent duty. The last provision which he would offer in the Committee was, that the Local Militia should be placed under the command of Officers in the Line.

Mr. Whitbread said, when the Bill was in a Committee, he would move a clause that those persons who were serving by substitute in the Army of Reserve, should be exempted from the Local Militia. There were cases where industrious persons, who had saved and paid 40 or 50 guineas for a substitute in the Army of Reserve, were drawn, and obliged to serve in the Militia. The instances were but few, and he thought the parties ought to be relieved, because the names of those serving by substitute in the Army of Reserve were not taken down, as it was thought that they were not liable to serve.

Sir Francis Burdett, while he was desirous of seeing the military strength of the country increased, pointed out, in a very able speech, the necessity of reforming the army, particularly with respect to the mode of punishing the soldiers. This Bill, he said, subjected the whole country to martial law, and it was degrading to Englishmen, while called upon to defend their liberties, to be placed in that situation to which the present practice of military discipline would reduce them.

A long conversation ensued, in which Colonel Wood, Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Windham, and several members took a part.

Lord Castlereagh replied, and the Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Wednesday.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 3.

A ballot stood for this day, for a Committee to try the Donegal election. There being only twenty-two eligible Members found, instead of forty-nine, required by the Grenville Act, an adjournment took place.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4.

Mr. Alderman Shaw presented a Petition from the Butchers of London and Westminster against the Flaying Act.

SUPERANNUATED JUDGES OF SCOTLAND.

A discussion took place between the Lord Advocate and Solicitor-General of Scotland, Mr. R. S. Dundas, Mr. Rose, Mr. Perceval, Mr. Whitbread, Sir F. Burdett, and Dr. Lawrence, the principal feature in their arguments was the objection to the Barons of the Exchequer receiving any pension on their retiring from duty, whether retiring from duty on account of old age, infirmity, or of having been in office for upwards of fifteen years. It was contended that these Barons were solely Commissioners for conducting the revenue, and that they did not go to the Circuits as the Lords of the Courts of Justiciary did, and therefore that their labours were not those of a severe or arduous description. To this it was answered, that the Judges of England and Ireland, including the Barons of the Courts of Exchequer in the respective countries, were provided for in the way intended, and therefore that it would be unjust not to extend a similar provision to the Barons of the Exchequer in Scotland. The House divided, when the numbers were—Ayes, for the Committee, 68, Noes against it, 25.

The House went into a Committee on a Resolution submitted by the Lord Advocate, granting to the Lord President of the Court of Session, the Lord Justice Clerk, and other Lords of Session, and of Justiciary; and also the Barons of the Exchequer, a sum amounting to three-fourths of the salaries enjoyed by these Judges, out of the hereditary revenues of the Crown in Scotland, on any of these Judges retiring from Office.

After some discussion, the Committee divided, when the Resolution was carried by a majority of 80 to 31.

The Local Militia Bill was committed. In the Committee it was divided into two Bills, for England and Scotland respectively. The blanks were filled up, the Report received, and the Bill ordered to be printed, and to be taken into further consideration on Wednesday next.

Mr. W. Taylor deferred his motion relative to the Expedition to the Dardanelles till to-morrow se'nnight.

In a Committee of Ways and Means issues of Exchequer Bills, to the amount of 3,000,000*l.* and of 1,500,000*l.* were agreed to.

The Order for hearing further evidence in support of the Petitions against the late Orders in Council dropped, Mr. Tierney not being present to make the motion.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 5.

Mr. Villars reported from the Dublin University Election Committee, that J. L. Foster, Esq. was duly elected; and that the Petition against his return was neither frivolous or vexatious.

Mr. Sheridan presented a Petition from St. John Mason, a Barrister, in Ireland, complaining of a grievance he had suffered. The Petition stated, that Mr. Mason had been called to the Irish Bar in Trinity Term, 1803, and that in the following month of August he was arrested, under the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, and committed to Kilmainham gaol, where he was confined for two years. The consequence of his confinement was the total loss of his professional business. The Petition also stated, that he had been ill-used while in confinement, and prayed relief. Mr. Sheridan moved, that the Petition do lie on the table.

After a short conversation between Mr. W. Smith, Mr. Browne in explanation, and Sir A. Wellesley, the Petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Huskisson moved that the House should, to-morrow, resolve into a Committee on so much of the Act of the 44th of the King, chap. 98. as relates to Licences for selling Ale. The Hon. Gentleman stated that Publicans, before they could sell ale, must, by the law as it stood, take out a Licence from a Justice of Peace. Licences for selling spirits and wines were granted by the Excise, and he meant to propose, that in future, all publicans licences for vending ale, wines, or spirits, should be granted by the Excise, in order to take the ale brewers out of the hands of the Magistrates, for certain cogent reasons, which were principally that the sums paid by publicans for such licences were always received by the Clerks of the Magistrates, who, in many instances, did not account for them, under the pretence that they could not collect the money. What he meant to propose was, that all publicans who retailed ale or other liquors, should go before a Magistrate, who for payment of two guineas, should grant them a certificate, entitling them to obtain such licence from the Commissioners of Excise. After a few words from Mr. G. Vansittart, Mr. D. Giddy, and Mr. L. Lefevre, Mr. Huskisson's motion was agreed to.

Mr. Huskisson moved the Order of the Day for taking into farther consideration the Repeal of the Assessed Taxes Consolidation Bill, for the purpose of its being recommitted.

On the clause regarding the killing of rabbits, Lord Porchester observed, that much evil and mischief would result from such a provision.

Mr. Birham said, that in Norfolk, where he resided, it was the principal occupation of the people to kill rabbits. The clause was altered, permitting proprietors of warrens to kill their own rabbits, but prohibiting all other persons from doing so. The next amendment was a clause authorising every owner or occupier of land, to demand from every person sporting on his grounds his certificate and qualification for shooting game.

Mr. Foster brought up the Report of the Committee of Supply for granting 9,250*l.* to the College of Maynooth.

Sir John Newport said, that in giving so small a sum, the consequence would be, that the Catholic Parishes in Ireland would, in time, be left without Priests, and therefore that body would consider themselves ill treated on the score of justice. He then moved, that the Report be re-committed.

Mr. M. Matthews insisted that the House would fail in its usual liberality, if the sum originally sought by his Hon. Friend, Sir J. Newport, was not given. The Catholics of Ireland were known to be loyal, and had refused advantageous offers from Bonaparte in the education of their students, and after having rejected these offers, it was consistent to apply for an adequate sum to support their establishment at home. But if this boon was circumscribed, the Catholics would naturally conclude, that as they were so niggardly excluded from the liberality of the British Government, they had no interest in protecting that Government.—(Hear! Hear!)

Lord H. Petty, in a speech of considerable length, supported the motion.

Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. Stephen opposed it.

On a division, there appeared—For the lesser grant, 106—For the larger, 82.

Another division took place, on an amendment by Mr. Lee ney, for delaying further proceedings on the resolution till Wednesday. It was negatived by a majority of 112 to 80.

On the motion of Mr. Tierney, further evidence against the Orders in Council was ordered to be heard on Thursday.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 6.

The Lord Advocate of Scotland brought up the Bill for granting an annuity to the Scottish Judges, on resignation or retirement. Read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Tuesday.

On the motion of Mr. Alderman Combe, the House resolved itself into a Committee on the Child Stealing Bill, when the worthy Alderman proposed to make the offence grand larceny.

The Report was ordered to be received on Monday.

Mr. Lushington postponed his motion respecting the ship l'Etrusco, till Tuesday next.

EAST INDIA COMPANY.

Mr. Creevey rose to make his promised motion; he said the Petition presented by the East India Company, praying a loan of 1,200,000*l.* gave a fallacious view of the Company's affairs, and was an absolute imposition. In that petition it is stated, that the Company is only deficient 2,400,000*l.*, when the fact was, that they were, to his knowledge, minus three millions. They also endeavour to make it appear that they had eight millions of property in this country; but by the accounts which he would move for, he would make it manifest that they were deficient at home 12 millions. They were, to his knowledge, deficient in India 22 millions, which they were bound to pay at home. He therefore concluded, by moving for an account of all the loans they had contracted in India, and the terms of these loans, in order to show that the Petition was a gross fraud; also for an account of the India Stock by computation. He then adverted to the formation of the Committee, which was partial, who were not likely to make an impartial report to the House.

Sir J. Anstruther said, that with regard to the solvency of the East India Company he thought the Hon. Gentleman grossly wrong; or, at least, completely in error and mistake. He asserted, that the Committee was fully competent to consider the whole of the debts and credits of the Company. His next objection was, that Mr. Creevey had allowed the Petition of the Company to be sent to a Committee without stating any objection, or giving the most remote hint of his intention, in the present, or in any other way, to interrupt its proceedings.

Lord Folkestone supported the motion.

Mr. C. Grant observed that the Hon. Gentleman had exhibited upon the present occasion a great deficiency of knowledge. He had asserted that the Company had recently had a deficit of three millions, but he had forgotten that the Company had raised a sum of two millions by bonds. The more he considered the motion of the Hon. Gentleman, the more was he convinced of its impropriety, as the Hon. Gentleman knew well that the accounts he had moved for would be laid on the table in a very few days. He condemned the partial introduction of the subject, previous to the report of the Committee having been made, as it was his most earnest wish that the affairs of the Company should be probed to the bottom.

Mr. Creevey replied, and said, that notwithstanding all the Hon. Gentlemen had said, he still maintained that the deficit of the Company amounted to twelve millions, and for him. Gentlemen to argue that such a sum would ever be paid, was holding the most gross delusion that he had ever seen attempted. He was confident that next year the Company would be again under the necessity of coming to Parliament for the purpose of obtaining another grant of the public money.

A short conversation ensued between Mr. Dundas and Mr. Creevey, and the former having promised productions of the papers moved for, in a few days, the original motion was withdrawn.

Mr. Creevey moved for an account of all loans contracted by the Company in India, and also for an account of the profit accruing to the Company from investments from India and China, for the years 1798-9, and 1806-7. These motions were disposed of in the same way with the first.

Sir T. Turton deferred his motion respecting the affairs of the Carnatic, till Tuesday se'nnight.

On the motion of Mr. Tremayne, the Dead Bodies Washed on Shore Interment Bill, went through the Committee.—Report on Tuesday.

A Petition was presented from ——— Morgan, Esq. of Howland-street, Fitzroy-square, against the return of Captain Rainier, for Sandwich. The Petition alleged bribery and corruption, and a want of qualification. It was ordered to be taken into consideration on Tuesday the 24th instant.

The Three Millions Exchequer Bills Bill was read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

Mr. R. Ward presented several Accounts relative to his Majesty's Droits of the Admiralty. Ordered to be printed.—Adjourned till Monday.

PROVINCIALS.

On Tuesday, at Pontefract sessions, the Cloth Returns for the last year were made as follow:—Narrow pieces 161,816; of 5,924,256 yards; decreased, 13,516 pieces.—Broad pieces, 262,024; in yards, 8,422,143; decreased 28,245 pieces.—Note. The decrease has been during the last half year.

At the Quarter Sessions for the county of Somerset, held last week at Wells, Thomas Prankett, of Bathwick, was found guilty of leaving his wife and family chargeable to the said parish, and sentenced to a fortnight's imprisonment, and to be whipped through every street in the parish.

A Correspondent, who remarks on the injury that will be done to farmers, if none but licensed gunners are permitted to destroy rabbits, says, Naturalists have calculated, that a single pair of rabbits may, in the space of four years, increase to the astonishing number of 1,274,840.

Lately, the house of Robert Whittall, at the Barnett's, near Tenbury, was accidentally burnt to the ground, together with most of the furniture: what renders it the more distressing, the poor man (who was a Carpenter by trade) is 87 years of age, and has been blind many years: about twenty years since, he providently made his coffin, in which he had deposited a cheese made by his late wife some years since, and a gammon of bacon, intended for his funeral, which were entirely consumed; and a barrel of cyder, about 7 years old, kept for the same purpose, was rolled into a pool, and the liquor saved.

The Turf.—It is supposed that there has been a greater mortality amongst the foals this year than ever was known. Many gentleman have lost half their stock. Lords Grosvenor and Egremont have been the principal sufferers.

Singular Occurrence.—At the Cock, at Kingsdown, in Somersetshire, is an old cat, now bringing up three young squirrels, which were put to her as soon as they could see, about three weeks ago—she also has a kitten a month old, the whole of which she suckles, and pays equal fondness and attention to. The same cat, about two years ago, brought up two rabbits.

On Saturday se'nnight, a fine young girl of five years of age, died at Glasgow, in consequence of being bit, about ten days ago, while asleep, by rats, to whom poison had been administered. On hearing the cries of the child, her parents hurried into the apartment where she slept, with a light, but not before these voracious animals had succeeded in abstracting a considerable quantity of blood from different parts of the body. Medical assistance was immediately procured, but, owing to the virus of the poison having affected the blood, every effort for restoring the little sufferer to health proved ineffectual, and she expired in great agony, exhibiting all the symptoms incident to such calamitous situations.

[Transmitted by Admiral Sir A. Cochrane, K. B.]

Sir, Cerberus, off Marie Galante, March 5.

I beg to acquaint you of the surrender of the Island of Marie Galante to his Majesty's arms.

Finding the Island afforded a shelter for the enemy's privateers with their captured vessels, and that it interfered considerably with the blockade of Guadaloupe, I considered it expedient to attack it, whereupon I gave Capt. Pigot the command of about 200 seamen and marines from the different ships named in the margin *; and, on the 2d instant, we weighed from Petit Terre, and, a little after day-light, effected a landing about two miles from the town, with little opposition, and soon after the Island surrendered at discretion, and the Commandant, with the national military force, are prisoners of war.

I find it a very valuable Island, in the highest state of cultivation, and a large quantity of colonial produce in the stores.—I have disembarked the marines and garrisoned the place, and shall remain with the force under my orders for your further directions.

I herewith inclose Capt. Pigot's letter to me on the occasion (wherein I am happy to observe the high terms in which he speak of Captain Bowen, and the officers and men under his command), together with a list of the arms and military stores taken on the Island. I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) W. Spray.

Sir, Circe, off Marie Galante, March 2.

You have done me the honour to give me the command of the debarkation of the seamen and marines of his Majesty's ships Cerberus, Circe, and Camilla, on the Island of Marie Galante. I have the pleasure to inform you it was effected without loss, and the only opposition, a few shot from a small battery to the northward; and that, notwithstanding the badness of the roads through the cane patches, I have infinite satisfaction in adding, that the good order and cool conduct of both seamen and marines merits the highest praise. From our early appearance at the end of the town, we found but little preparations for resistance, except a field-piece, placed in the centre of the principal street, on approaching which a flag of truce was sent, and the Island surrendered at discretion. I cannot close this without expressing the support I had in Captain Bowen, of his Majesty's ship Camilla, and all the officers employed on this service. I have the honour to be, &c. (Signed) Hugh Pigot.

A Return of Ordnance found in the Island of Marie Galante.

Town of Grand Bourg—1 six pounder field-piece.
Fort—2 twenty-four pounders, and 1 six pounder.
Vieux Fort—2 eighteen pounders.
St. Louis—2 eighteen pounders.
Le Marechal—2 twenty-four pounders.
Le Bas—1 twenty-four pounder.
Cape Esterre—2 twelve pounders.
Three hundred small arms.
One hundred barrels of powder in the grand magazine.

(Signed) H. Pigot.

* Cerberus, Circe, and Camilla.

SATURDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

Foreign Office, May 4, 1808.

The Right Honourable George Canning, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has this day notified to the Ministers of friendly and neutral powers resident at this Court, that his Majesty has judged it expedient to establish the most rigorous blockade of the Port of Copenhagen, and of all the other Ports in the Island of Zealand; and that the same will be maintained and enforced in the strictest manner, according to the usages of war acknowledged and allowed in similar cases.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

The Expedition sailed from the Downs and from Harwich on Wednesday last. The vessels remained at anchor off Orfordness, in consequence of a temporary change of wind, but as the breeze soon veered to the southward, they have probably proceeded. All the armaments are to rendezvous in Yarmouth Roads. There were eighty-four transports, of which four and thirty contained cavalry. Nearly three hundred flat-bottomed boats too, were on board the transports. The following is the Staff of the Expedition :—

Lieut.-Gen. Sir John Moore, Commander in Chief; Major-Gen. M'Kenzie Frazer, second in command; Major-Gen. Clinton, on the Staff; Col. Murray, Quarter-master-General, Major de Blaquire, ditto; Inspector of Hospitals, Dr. Franks; Deputy ditto, Mr. Ferguson; Physicians to the Forces, Drs. Larkin, Tyce, and Morris; Staff-Surgeons, Montague, Lindsay, Dyaly, and Kratziesen; Apothecaries, Henderson, and Hoffee; Purveyor, Assistant Mates, ditto; Deputy Commissary, —— Kennedy, Esq.; Assistant, Mr. Gauntlett.

Under such a General as Sir JOHN MOORE much may be atchieved. It is long since British troops have gained a victory abroad, untarnished by the disgrace of injustice: and we hope that the dreadful example which our Government has received of continental resentment for the seizure at Copenhagen, will teach them hereafter to season their active zeal with some few sprinklings of prudence and justice, although they may be too proud to make a verbal confession of their error. This Expedition is said to be destined for the Baltic; if the last had not gone out, it would never have been necessary. But our Ministers, as if afraid lest the courage of our soldiers should grow rusty, dispatch one set of men to irritate the nations of the Continent, and then ship off a second party to contend with them when they are irritated.

It has been said, that another Squadron, unaccompanied by transports, is about to sail from Cawsand Bay, having sealed orders, and provisions for six months. The ships mentioned were the Tonnant, the Gibraltar, the Bellerophon, the Brunswick, the Dragon, and the Neptune, men of war; two frigates, and two sloops. All these were to be commanded by Admiral DE COURCY.

Within these few days a great number of emigrants have arrived from Portugal, at Plymouth: they came in a transport from our fleet off Lisbon. Our Squadron had been apprized of the arrival of the Prince Regent at Rio Janeiro on the 6th of January. He had entered on his functions as a Sovereign, and formed an Administration, which was approved by the people. It is said, that an Englishman has the superintendance of the Admiralty. Orders had been given for the immediate construction of ships of war; a declaration of hostilities had been issued against Spanish America: and sixteen millions of dollars belonging to Spain had been sequestered.

In Portugal the rage of emigration had become so general, that any person detected in leaving the country, was subjected to death and confiscation of property. At Lisbon provisions were not scarce. On Monday Mr. FAWKENER, from our Government, requested Mr. M'KERRALL to communicate a Circular Note to the Merchants employed in the Brazil trade, that the Portuguese Minister was ready to give licences to British or Portuguese ships, to carry out British manufactured cotton goods to the Brazils, under certain instructions: and that licences would be prepared on Tuesday morning by the Lords of Trade.

An Order of Council will shortly appear for the restoration of all such property detained in this country as belongs to Portuguese subjects, now in this kingdom, or in the Brazils with their Sovereign: and a reference will be made to the Prince Regent concerning the property of those Portuguese who are under the denomination of France.—Thus will be preserved the property of those who have the courage to adhere to their Monarch: and the possessions of those who have submitted to the enemy, will afford the means of relief to loyal subjects.

The American ship the Osage arrived at Falmouth on Saturday the 30th of April. She brought only three passengers, Mr. LOUIS, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. NOURSE. The last is said to have come only on mercantile business, and Mr. LOUIS is reported to have brought dispatches from General ARMSTRONG to Mr. PINCKNEY.

Every circumstance that we can gather, proves the vigorous disposition of the French Government towards the Americans. BONAPARTE, it is said, will have no neutrals: and he has even refused passports to the Americans in France. Mr. MORGAN made his escape on board the Osage. Nay, the Osage herself, after her arrival at L'Orient, was seized because she had been spoken by a British cruizer off that port. Accounts received last week from Bayonne actually state, that BONAPARTE issued a Decree there on the 4th of last month, ordering the capture and condemnation of all American vessels.

We should be sorry to see any unnecessary acrimony employed against America: we have wars anew already upon our consciences and upon our purses: but we hope that Government will make no abject concessions for the sake of American friendship. America's friendship is but a time-serving amity: she can do us little good, she can do France little harm. Now that France appears to have completely shaken her off, she may wish to be on the best terms with us: But let us consider that she comes to us from necessity, not from love, and that we have a right to make the best bargain we can.

On Thursday last Mr. PINCKNEY had a conference of several hours with Mr. CANNING.

In another part of our Paper we have given a detail of the operations of the Swedish war. They are of a nature highly honourable to the gallantry and military skill of our Allies, and we trust that he will continue to pursue the career he has begun, until he shall have secured to himself and his country, by the proofs of Swedish spirit and independence, the solid advantages of an honourable and permanent peace. For probably there is no mode of obtaining security from BONAPARTE, except the proving to him that he has it not in his power to prevent that security.

It is said, that a vessel has just arrived from Holland—that the men were not immediately supposed to land, but that three women had obtained that permission. It is added, that an Austrian Messenger, supposed to bear dispatches from Vienna, landed at Harwich at two o'clock yesterday morning. We have not been able to ascertain what faith may be due to these statements.

The report of a revolution in Russia, of the truth of which we expressed some doubts in our last Number, now appears, as we suspected, to be totally without foundation. Letters were received in town on Monday from Riga, which make not the slighest mention of any disturbances in St. Petersburgh.

The Court of St. Petersburgh has published the following Notification, which will doubtless be interesting to all those concerned in Russian Commerce:—

"The Imperial College of Commerce notifies, that in consequence of an Imperial Edict, issued on the 8th November, 1807, for the establishment of a Commission to liquidate all accounts subsisting between the Russian and British subjects in St. Peters-burgh, Riga, and Archangel, that the same is now opened; and to which commission, all British subjects are compelled to produce a balance of their property, namely, such as may consist in ships lying in any of the ports of Russia; merchandize lying at the Exchange, or in the Custom-house warehouses; also of their capitals and books, excepting only such monies as are placed in the Bank. And whoever has any kind of demand on the British, or who are themselves indebted to them, are bound to give in an account thereof to any one of the Liquidative Commissions, most suitable to themselves, within four months from the first publication thereof in the Newspaper. After that time has elapsed, the Commission will neither receive nor discharge any demand which may be made."

From the German Articles in the series of Moniteurs which arrived on Monday, it appears that Austria is assuming a menacing attitude against Turkey. The German Papers that arrived on Wednesday, seem to make this at least certain, that the French troops are marching from the upper part of Italy towards Greece, and that Russia, as well as Austria, is making demonstrations against the Porte: but whether for the sake of intimidating the Turkish Government into an accession to the project against England, or with a view to an immediate conquest of Turkey in Europe, it is not easy to decide. But it should seem that the story of a scheme for the immediate dismemberment of Turkey, is incompatible with the report that leave has been granted to the French armies of passing through Asiatic Turkey into Persia.

A French Artillery Officer of rank has lately written a letter from Dalmatia to a brother officer in the north of Germany, in which he assures the latter, that the expedition against the British territories in the East Indies will certainly go forward, both on the part of the French and Russians, whose combined armies are to co-operate. Marmont is to have the chief command. The French army, reinforced by troops from the German Confederates, will march from Dalmatia to Astracan, where it will be joined by the Russians.

Lucien Bonaparte lives in all the seclusion of a private man at Rome, and all the offers of his brother Napoleon to make him a Prince, or a Sovereign, have been rejected by him. He refuses to acknowledge the latter by his title of Emperor and King, and assigns for reasons, that he had power enough, as First Consul of France, as a Republic, and should have remained true to the cause of Republican representation, for which he formerly fought by order of Napoleon. The name of Lucien Bonaparte has been erased from the list of the Imperial Family.

The fate of the Pope and his territories will now probably be soon decided. It is said, that at first, he would not admit to an audience the French General Miollis, who so gallantly planted the artillery of his army against the Pope's Palace on his entering Rome. The French Minister, it is reported, introduced Miollis without the knowledge of the Pope, who then no longer could avoid the interview. He would not speak to the General a single word on State affairs, but referred him to the Cardinal Secretary. The French General, instead of kissing his Holiness's slipper, only made him a bow; when Pius sarcastically asked him "Scite Catolico, Voi?"—"Are you a Catholic?" Miollis answering in the affirmative, the Pope gave him the usual blessing.

Bonaparte has granted domain lands in Hanover to no less than seventy of his officers, of the annual value of more than two and a half millions of florins.

A man named Daphne, at present in custody on a charge of picking pockets, lately made an attempt to rob the mail, in a novel and extraordinary way:—the London mail being near the town of Maidenhead, and the guard's horn being within hearing in the town, this fellow got close to the post-office, blew a horn so similar to the guard's, that the postmaster threw the bag out of his window, and Daphne got clear off with it. On his being taken into custody, he was discharged for want of legal evidence.

An extraordinary circumstance is stated to have happened recently at Bath. A gentleman of family and fortune entertained some time ago a young man in his service, who was seized with a sudden indisposition, which required that he should be immediately bled. Professional assistance was not at hand, and the Gentleman, who understood phlebotomy, proceeded to bare the arm, when he discovered the initials of his own name, which had been inserted in the manner common among sailors. This brought to his recollection, that many years ago a child of his own had been thus marked before it was entrusted to the care of certain persons in an inferior situation of life; and upon enquiry, consequential to this discovery, the Gentleman ascertained that the servant was his own son.

A post chaise and four arrived at a house of notorious ill fame in Catherine-street, Strand, yesterday afternoon. From the rapidity of the movements of the servants, and other circumstances, induced the spectators to believe that the chaise brought some deluded female to that infamous place of resort. The above house is of the most infamous description, and ought to be narrowly watched by the police.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

HIS MAJESTY'S LEVEE.

Wednesday His Majesty, at two o'clock, held a Private Levee, at the Queen's Palace, when the following had the honour of being presented to His Majesty:—

The Earl of Shannon, upon coming to his title; Col. Carlton, upon his promotion, and being under orders for Canada, by the Earl of Effingham; the Earl of Scarborough, upon coming to his title; Mr. Augustus Foster, his Majesty's Secretary of Legation to the United States of America, on his return on leave of absence; Admiral Bailer, upon his promotion; Lieut.-Col. Brown, Aid-de-Camp to the Commander in Chief, upon his promotion; and Captain Moorsam, Private Secretary to Lord Mulgrave, upon his being appointed Colonel of the Royal Marines.

His Majesty held a Privy Council, and gave audiences to the Duke of Portland, the Cabinet Ministers, Earl Shannon, and Mr. Ryder.

FRACAS IN HIGH LIFE.—At the Countess of Essex's grand rout, on Tuesday night, the Earl of T—lle's and the Earl of C—l's carriages were called at the same time, and each coachman strove, with all his professional skill, for precedence; but the Earl of T—lle's reached the door first, and received the venerable Earl, his Countess, and fair daughters. The Earl of C—l, dissatisfied with his coachman, ran down the steps, seized the reins of the horses, and backed his own carriage, endeavouring at the same time to take the coachman from the box. The servants took the part of their brother of the whip: the Earl of C—l was very roughly handled and obliged to sound a retreat, after having fallen under the horses' feet. Considerable apprehensions were entertained for his safety, but his Lordship, we understand, did not receive any material injury.

CRIM. CON.—The wife of Mr. M—, a confectioner, in Queen Ann-street East, eloped from her husband a few days since, and was traced to the arms of a butler, in Baker-street, North. The lady had apartments in the house of an upper servant, belonging to the same family as the butler, but in consequence of too much attention have been paid her by the butler, the husband removed her. This, however, did not succeed, for one day last week the wife left her home with a young child, as she informed her husband, to pay a visit to her mother, at Richmond, but did not return at night, and on the following day the husband had the mortification to find, that she had left her child with her mother, and fled. After a long search, she was traced to an apartment in John-street, Mary-le-bonne. The husband, with an officer, on forcing the door of a bed-room, found her in the arms of her paramour. The rage of the husband was suppressed by the officer, and he departed, having placed his wife in proper hands. Steps have been taken for legal redress, and consequently the business will be settled in Westminster Hall.

There is a tale in the higher circles, of an act of human depravity, that, if well founded, cannot be too widely exposed to public abhorence:—that of an antiquated Peer having incestuously seduced his own natural daughter from the cottage of her mother, where he had concealed them both for many years, with the scantiest means for their subsistence!

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

Although we are not among those who conceive that Comedy is now at a very low ebb in Great Britain, yet we have more than once had occasion to regret that the English Opera has fallen to so deplorable a situation as that which it occupies at the present day. Mr. Cumberland has produced an Opera called the Jew of Mogadore, which was acted for the first time on Tuesday evening: and we are sorry to say, that he has done nothing for the redemption of English credit in this particular. To say that Mr. Cumberland's dialogue does not abound with bad English, bad Grammar, stupid puns, and false metaphors, is to say very little in his favour; and yet we are obliged to confess that in his favour we can add little more.

The story of this piece it will be impossible for us to lay before our Readers, because, with all the attention that we bestowed upon the play, during the representation, we were unable to discover any thing that approached the nature of a plot. We were fortunate enough to perceive only that the Prince of Mogadore was in love with a lady, who, attended by some persons from Cyprus, was shipwrecked on the African coast, and bought by a Jew of Mogadore. This Jew was exceedingly benevolent, for he purchased slaves, that he might have the pleasure of setting them free again, and probably, as the vulgar saying has it, he contrived to live by the loss. The Prince seemed to be a good deal displeased at first, when he understood that Giovanni, who seemed to be the commander of the vessel from Cyprus, had taken the liberty of bringing the lady with him: but on finding that Giovanni had used her very well, he graciously forgave him. On the arrival of the news of the old Monarch's death, which happens, with great dramatic fitness, in the last act, the Prince ascends the throne, and all the people seem to be happy enough. It is observable that the Jew, whose principles are so adverse to slavery, has long kept in his house an Irishman, and a woman who we believe is a Persian, as mere slaves: and at the end of the play, recollecting that his conscience is hostile to slavery, he tells them that he cannot think of keeping them as slaves, and compliments them by requesting their acceptance of their liberty. There is another Jew, of a less liberal disposition, who brings himself into the disagreeable clutches of the penal law, and then is begged off: but we could not at all understand what he had to do with the play. The character, or rather the part, which Mrs. Bland represented, is attended, to our view, with the same disadvantage.

The actors were too good for the business they had to execute. Mr. Dowton, from whose character of Nadab the play takes its name, had nothing to do but to speak a few benevolent sentences: and if the Managers have a mind to equalize their actors in the general opinion, by way of getting an excuse for lowering their salaries, we think they cannot contrive any better scheme than that of putting good comedians into such parts as this Jew. These are the parts that remove all distinction between good actors and bad ones; for, as the servant says in the farce, Joan is as good as my lady in the dark. Mr. Penley plays the other Jew: and we should recommend it to him, when this Jew is labouring under the apprehensions of speedy execution, to be a little less jocular in his tone and in the muscles of his face. Madame Catalani, it is true, has a smile upon her countenance even in the deepest distress: but Mr. Penley is not so pretty as Madame Catalani, and does not become a smile by any means so well; and besides, an actor or actress, though handsomer than Apollo or Venus, should always recollect that people in extremity of suffering are not apt to indulge themselves in mirth: let not Mr. Penley plead the almost solitary example of Sir Thomas Moore, who jested as he mounted the scaffold.—We must not omit to praise the chaste, yet impressive acting of Mr. Holland, in the part of the Prince.

The music is the production of Mr. Kelly. We will not affront that gentleman by any compliments about its originality, for we know that he would perceive the ironical effect which any such panegyric must convey; but he deserves at least the credit of having well adapted most of the songs to the talents of the respective singers. Mr. Braham and Mrs. Mountain did the greatest justice to the compositions which were committed to them.

The Play was heard with the most attentive endurance, till the end; but human fortitude could not, without some expression of impatience, suffer so very dull, flat, and unintelligible an Opera; and the hisses of the audience became so loud and so general, as to drown the voice of Mr. Holland, who tried to give it out for a second representation. But the play bills, as usual, inform us every morning of its great success, and the piece continues to be acted.

COVENT-GARDEN.

Bonduca, a play of Beaumont and Fletcher, was acted on Tuesday night, for the benefit of Mr. Cooke, and repeated on Thursday night for the injury of the Theatre. This very ill-constructed and very harshly written drama, is thus cast in its principal characters:—

Caratach.....Mr. Cooke.
Hengo.....Miss M. Bristow.
Suetonius.....Mr. Murray.
Penius.....Mr. C. Kemble.
Petillius.....Mr. Pope.
Junius.....Mr. Brunton.
Judas.....Mr. Munden.
Bonduca.....Mrs. St. Leger.
First Daughter.....Mrs. H. Johnston.
Second Daughter.....Miss Bristow.

The story is very nearly the same as that of the Drury Lane Ballet, to which it has served as a model. The Romans under Suetonius have invaded England. They engage and conquer the Britons. Penius, who, in consequence of a quarrel with the General, has refused to fight against the Britons, kills himself in remorse on learning the glory that his Roman fellow-soldiers have gained. Caratach, the British chief, being defeated, flies among the rocks with the boy Hengo; Bonduca, and her two daughters, poison themselves. Hengo is shot by Judas, whom Caratach kills for the deed: the Romans offer honourable burial for the child, and Caratach surrenders.

All these incidents happen with an abrupt and almost ridiculous rapidity. We hardly know who the people are, certainly we have no time to contract any regard for them, when suddenly they kill themselves, or perform some such act, which must always be the more ludicrous when improbably managed, in proportion as it is affecting when naturally introduced.

The poetry of this Play is almost universally flat and tame, or stubborn and quaint: perhaps the only passage of merit is that in which the High Priest of the Britons, describing the march of Death, utters this most striking line—

Wide waves his bickering blade, and fires the fields of air.

However, the Play is certainly not without discrimination of character. Caratach is open and generous; the only fault of his dramatic temper is his want of gallantry to the women, whom he never addresses but in objurgatory terms. Penius is a plain rough soldier; proud, brave, and gloomy. Petillius is a plain rough soldier; easy, thoughtless, and gay. Junius is a soldier in love. Judas is a soldier, with a touch of cowardice, and a great propensity for eating: this character has a good deal of humour. Bonduca is a bully in petticoats; a personage certainly not agreeable, but if married men tell truth, not quite out of nature.

Mrs. St. Leger's figure is rather too large for the sort of dress which she wears in Bonduca. She would do well to be less fiery in the colours of her attire, and in the tones of her voice. At present she seems a caricature of the Britannias that one sees painted upon sign-posts. Mr. Pope's Petillius needs no emendation: it is at once a spirited and a correct performance. Nor can we too highly praise the Judas of that admirably humourous actor, Mr. Munden. His hunger, his drunkenness, his impudence, his fear, are all equally entertaining and equally true. The other parts are none of them worth much notice, except the Caratach of Mr. Cooke; and the notice that Mr. Cooke requires in this part, is the notice of his "bad eminence." Hard, harsh, uninteresting, where he ought to be generous, affecting, and noble; he confounded all the principles of his art, and played ill by the very means that in other parts have caused him to play well. In short, he forgot that Caratach lifting his sword for the safety of his country, was not Shylock sharpening his knife for the execution of the merchant. One instance of this kind of error will suffice; we select the concluding passage of the play, which Mr. Cooke delivers with all the rage of disappointed vengeance. The reader needs peruse it but once to perceive that it ought to be delivered with serene magnanimity:

——"Rome shall know
"The firmness of a Briton's soul; shall know
"Britons can brave the chance of war! If Fortune
"Smile on their arms, they spare the vanquish'd foe;
"Vanquish'd themselves, in naked majesty,
"Like their own knotted oak, by thunder blasted,
"Nobly they stand the tempest of their fate.
"Now, Roman, I am thine. Set on, I follow.

The only object which we can guess to have existed in the revival of this Play, appears to have been the injury of the Ballet at Drury-Lane. If that were the motive, Mr. Harris is justly punished; for we do not believe that there were as many spectators on Thursday night as would pay the charges of the House. He is by no means sparing of expence; but what is the use of bestowing expence on such Tragedies as Bondura, such Operas as The Travellers in Switzerland, and such Afterpieces as Bonifacio and Bridgetina?

We are happy to find that Mr. Cooke is shortly to play Kent to Mr. Kemble's Lear, with Mr. C. Kemble for the Edgar. Then we may hope to see a play well acted.

Mrs. C. Kemble's Benefit is fixed for Tuesday the 20th inst. when will be represented a New Comedy, called "Match Making; or, 'Tis a Wise Child that knows its own Father," with a favourite Interlude, and a Musical Entertainment.

We sincerely wish that the Golden Fleece, or more properly the classical story taken from that celebrated poet Valerius Flacus, called "Jason and Medea," may prove a golden fleece to the Proprietors of the Minor Theatre, Catherine-street, Strand; the machinery, scenery, decorations, &c. are very pleasing, and we are informed were invented by Mr. Johnston, late of Drury Lane Theatre.

FINE ARTS.

The fortieth exhibition of the Royal Academy at Somerset-House has now appeared, and continues to attract all those with whom the love of the arts, of fashion, or of a lounge, is a motive powerful enough to vanquish the horrors of heat. Two of the artists who formerly drew the greatest admiration, are not recognised in this exhibition; one has been snatched from public attention by an untimely death, and the other by his own diffidence. The last exhibition contained several of the works of Mrs. Opie: Mr. Opie is now no more. The last exhibition contained several works of Mr. Hoppner; but Mr. Hoppner, conceiving that none of his most recent paintings are worthy of his own reputation, has now, with a self-command and coolness of determination exceedingly unusual among men of genius, refused to send any of his paintings to the exhibition. Having thus paid our tribute of respect to the artists who are absent, we proceed to speak of the merits of those who are present.

The Royal Academicians, as may be always expected, have furnished the greatest number of striking pictures.

35. A Portrait.—H. Thomson, R. A.

"Lo, the poor Indian, whose untutor'd mind,
"Sees God in clouds, and hears him in the wind!"

This picture is the portrait of an Indian female, kneeling and adoring the deity that manifests himself amid the storm. The expression of the upper part of her face has a mixture of sweetness and sublimity, that we scarcely hoped ever to see united. The management of the light which a tempestuous sky throws on a break of the sea that sweeps in the back ground, is exquisitely conducted; the colouring is chaste, and at the same time harmonious; and Mr. Thomson seems to have completely obtained that power, which, in painting, as well as in poetry, is accept to escape the careless, ignorant, or indolent minds of inferior artists, the power of subjecting imagination without depression, of preserving vigour without neglecting elegance, and of "forgetting a temperance even in the whirlwind of passion."

71. Lavinia.—M. A. Shee, R. A.

This is the best picture which we have ever seen of Mr. Shee's. The figure of Lavinia is single; and the attitude in which she sits is natural and simple. The face and neck are extremely meritorious in colouring, and the picure could scarcely fail to please even an unpractised eye. If there be any fault in it, we are inclined to think that fault exists in the representation of the turf on which Lavinia sits. The ground has too square an effect for a natural bank—it looks as if it were chisseled stone.

75. Portrait of Lady Heathcote.—W. Owen, R. A.

The genius of this admirable artist continues to expand itself, and appears at length to have called forth that applause which is so justly its due. The best judges of the art, and the uncultivated spectators who gaze but for a show, have all concurred in extolling this portrait. Mr. Owen is an artist of real genius; and as it is the property of real genius to place no bounds to its progress of improvement, we doubt not that his future works will give us many opportunities of repeating, and even increasing the high praise which we are bound to bestow upon this picture.

112. The Death of Lord Nelson in the Cockpit of the Ship Victory.—B. West, R. A.

So great a fame has been acquired by this artist for his Death of General Wolfe, that any stranger who looks at the Death of Lord Nelson now in the Exhibition, will scarcely believe the same hand to have produced both. This picture abounds with Mr. West's worst faults; and the whole has a hard, dry, disagreeable effect, which disappointed us the more in proportion to the interest of the subject, and the celebrity of the artist.

CITY.

Bread.—On Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of bread to be continued as before, viz. the quartern loaf, wheaten, to be sold for 11d. and the household 9½d.

Friday a Court of Common Council was held at Guildhall, and after a long desultory conversation thanks were voted to the Rev. C. J. Baynes, for his sermon preached at St. Paul's, on the Fast Day.

A Report was presented from the Committee of City Lands, concerning Smithfield Market, recommending the adoption of a plan suggested by Mr. Joshua Trimmer, as to the regulations of the said Market, and recommending a remuneration of 400*l.* a year for the same, which was negatived by the Court.

A Report was read from the Committee of General Purposes, as to the income of the City, which was stated to be 10,792*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.* chargeable to the Property Tax, which was ordered to be returned.

A Letter from Captain Rogers and one from Admiral Stirling, in return to the votes of thanks of the Court, were laid by the Lord Mayor before the Court, and ordered to be entered on the Journals.

The Chamberlain presented his account of receipts and expenditure for the year 1807. The Clerk of the Comptroller also his charge upon the Chamberlain; and the Clerk of the Bridge-house his accounts, which were severally ordered to be printed, and a copy thereof sent to every Member of the Court.

The Committee of City Lands were ordered to stay proceedings in a Bill presented to the House of Commons concerning Smithfield Market, they having exceeded their instructions.

Admiral Sir T. Louis having died before the sword voted him by the Court, could have been presented, the same was ordered to be presented to his son, now Sir John Louis, a Post Captain, as a testimony of the esteem his father was held in by the Court.

The Remembrancer laid before the Court a Bill for the Establishment of a Local Militia; also the Leather Cutters' Bill, which was referred to the Committee of City Lands.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Monday, an account was received at the East India House, that the undermentioned outward-bound ships were off the Cape de Verd Islands, the 7th of March last:—Elphinstone, Winchelsea, Walmer Castle, Phœnix, and Essex.

Wednesday, a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when Captains Hawes and Young, of the Monarch and Lord Eldon, took leave previous to departing, the former for Madeira, Coast and Bay, the latter for Bombay.—Adjourned.

REGULATION OF ASSESSED TAXES.

The Bill now before Parliament repeals the present duties of assessed taxes, grants new duties in lieu thereof, and certain additional duties to be consolidated therewith; it also appeals the stamp duties on game certificates, and grants new duties in lieu thereof. The duties are specified in schedules which occupy thirty pages. The following are the principal:—

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

Dispatches have been received at the Admiralty, which are said to speak of the Brest fleet as making motions indicative of a disposition to put to sea.

The Brazil and East India fleets sailed from Portsmouth on Friday; the latter will not touch at the Cape.—Lord Strangford, Sir James Gambier, and several officers, sailed in the Brazil fleet.

YARMOUTH, MAY 5.—The gun-boats which accompany the expedition are about 30 tons burden, sloop rigged, and carry one long 18-pound carronade aft, on a traversing swivel; they draw three feet nine inches water, and row 28 oars.

The British force now in the Baltic is seven sail of the line, five frigates, and several gun boats. The Danes have only one 64, several armed Indiamen, and gun-boats. The Russians cannot move as yet, on account of the ice, and cannot bring out more than twelve sail of the line. The Swedes have five sail of the line, six frigates, and five gun-brigs, cruizing off Rugen.

MAY 6.—This morning, between four and five o'clock, Admiral Keats arrived in the Mars, and saluted the Admirals lying in these Roads: he was followed by the Audacious, 74, Sparrow Hawke, Ranger, Zebra, Hearty, Pierrer, and Tygress, several gun-boats, and upwards of 100 sail of transports, with troops, &c. for the Expedition, and which are to remain here until further orders.—Wind S.

Yesterday P. M. arrived the Stately and Nassau, of 64 guns, from the Baltic, and landed their sick and wounded.

POLICE.

PUBLIC-OFFICE, BOW-STREET.

On Monday, Joseph Moody, the soldier, belonging to the 3d regiment of Foot Guards, was brought up for re-examination.—A labouring man stated, that he saw Bowden, who claims the money, in company with the prisoner, in the Three Compasses public-house, Drury-lane, on Tuesday morning at six o'clock. They were both apparently in liquor, and after drinking some more with two girls who came in, they went away. Some other evidence was given of what passed while they remained in the public house. The prisoner was finally committed for trial, and the parties bound over to prosecute.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

— M'Donald was on Friday charged by Mr. Russell, of Drury-lane Theatre, with an assault on his daughter. It appeared by the statement of Miss Russell that she was walking along Greek-street, Soho, about half-past nine o'clock on Thursday evening, when the Defendant accosted her in terms very familiar, and proceeded to take further unwarrantable liberties. The young lady requested him to desist, and her father, who was on horseback at a short distance, informed him that the lady was his daughter, and advised him not to molest her. Some words arose, which were followed by blows, at the commencement of which, Mr. R. made free use of the handle of his horsewhip, and afterwards pugilistic skill, of which the Defendant, notwithstanding his Herculean form, exhibited many dreadful marks, particularly on his head, which was most hideously disfigured. The watchman at length interfered, and the Defendant was given in charge, which he retaliated on Mr. Russell, but the lessons of late given in Westminster-hall, seem to have put Peace-officers on their guard, and the latter charge was rejected. The Prosecutor did not desire the Defendant should be held to bail, the Magistrate having given it as his opinion that he had been deservedly and severely punished, and he was consequently discharged.

BIRTH.

On Friday morning, in Caroline-place, the Lady of Captain Charles Graham, of the William Pitt East Indiaman, of a son.

MARRIED.

By special licence, at Hampton Lodge, Surrey, the seat of Edward B. Long, Esq. Sir Nelson Rycroft, Bart. to Miss Margaret Mandeville.

DIED.

On Wednesday last, at Bickley, in Kent, Mary Ann, second daughter of the Rev. Henry Drummond, Rector of Fawley, county of Southampton.

Lately, at Lauten-en-le-Morthen, Yorkshire, the old Parish Clerk of that village, aged 94 years: during that period his sight was so strong that he had no occasion to use spectacles, and filled faithfully the following situations 76 years—parish clerk, sexton, grave-digger, parish-ringer, and dog-whipper: and, in his youthful days, he reaped with a sickle five statute acres of wheat in five days.

On Thursday last, at Knight's Hill Cottage, Dulwich, Mrs. Harvey.

LONDON MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.

FRIDAY, MAY 6.—Since Monday last our arrivals of all kinds of grain have been very small. Wheat is dull in sale, but Monday's prices are maintained. Barley is scarce, and again rather dearer. Beans that are dry and good, meet a fresh sale. Having but few Oats at Market, this grain is lively in disposal, at higher prices.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER TWENTY.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S ACT FOR THE DISCHARGE OF DEBTORS IN EXECUTION FOR SMALL DEBTS.

We are always inclined to support the Government of our country, when we can support it with any degree of justice: but of late we have witnessed the introduction of military and civil measures, so violent, oppressive, and inquisitory in their nature, that we are not surprised to see the eagerness with which shallow people embrace the wild bigotries of a discontented faction: and we have sometimes been almost induced to doubt, on some occasions, the common sense and common honesty of the people who have brought such schemes before the public. In times like these, then, we are particularly delighted to welcome every measure which comes forward for the amelioration of the condition of the poor, and for the advancement of the real cause of liberty: and the name of Lord Ellenborough's new Act will perhaps have some balmy power in [illegible] the discontents which have been almost universally occasioned by the oppressive Militia Plan of the Secretary of the War Department, and by the unconstitutional Indictment Bill of the Attorney General. We are travelling along a desert region—the length of our journey uncertain, its end is unknown—its course is cheerless and forlorn: those who should seek more comfortable lodging for our march, throw obstacles in the way of our progress: we are parched, fatigued, almost overwhelmed with the difficulties and dangers of our situation: and amidst those perilous and discouraging circumstances, the traveller will be more than ordinarily grateful to him, who has formed a refreshing stream upon their path, and revived the languor of their fainting souls.

The Bill of which we now speak, enacts,

"That all persons in execution upon a judgment in any Court, whether of Record or otherwise, for any debt or damages not exceeding twenty pounds, exclusive of the costs, and who shall have lain in prison thereupon for twelve months before application to be discharged, shall be discharged upon such application in Term-time to one of the superior Courts of Record at Westminster. Notwithstanding such discharge, the judgment shall continue in force to all intents and purposes except as to taking the Debtor's person in execution, and that the lands and property (except wearing apparel, bedding, and tools, not exceeding the value of ten pounds in the whole) will continue to be liable."

To this Bill we cannot speak in terms of too high approbation. While mercy toward the unfortunate appears to have been its principal object, justice toward the aggrieved has not been left out of its provisions. The system of imprisonment for debt is one of those features in our institutions, which have excited the greatest disgust in the minds of the lower classes of people: and however disgusting that system may appear to those whose circumstances permit them to estimate such matters with coolness, yet it will constantly continue to create heart-burnings among people whose means are too narrow to place them beyond the reach of its rigours. It seems to them a matter of great injustice that any man should be snatched from his family, from his business, and of course from his livelihood, for so small a sum as ten pounds, particularly when the arrest is occasioned, as we fear too often is the case, by motives of mere revenge in the Creditor. But while we admit the possible hardship of the system, we cannot go so far as to deny its general utility. People who declaim on these subjects are always glad to find an excuse for addressing the passions: a poor man arrested for a small debt is an excellent subject for the excitation of pity; and many a pathetic lecture is delivered in defence of extravagance and profligacy sinking to punishment, while nobody thinks of pitying the case of the suffering Creditor, whose kindness has been abused, whose property has been wasted, and whose humanity and generosity are finally impeached. The temptations of borrowing money, or of taking up goods upon credit, are so many and so hard to be resisted, that probably it is necessary to impose some subsequent punishment of a very heavy nature, the fear of which may operate as a preventive check upon the improvidence of human nature. When the Legislature passed an Act to make the purloining of a porter-pot at the corner of the street, a capital offence, the Act was carried, not because the crime in itself was of the blackest description, but because the constant occurrence of temptation, and the facility of unperceived robbery rendered it likely that this dangerous custom would make up in frequency what it wanted in atrocity. Such is exactly the case with the question of justice in imprisonment for debt. We may lament that in particular instances any law should be attended with unusual hardships: but the hardship of particular instances is not to be put in competition with the benefit of the whole.

But when a method can be found of securing the general benefit of the people, and of removing, at the same time, the hardships of particular individuals, legislation appears to have accomplished all its objects, and arrived at its highest perfection. These objects Lord Ellenborough appears to have accomplished, and for this perfection he deserves to be extolled. Very poor persons, who principally feel the oppression of the system of imprisonment, are not in general likely to run in debt with any one Creditor to the amount of twenty pounds; and if they do contract engagements which they are unable to fulfil, but which do not arise to so large a sum, they have the satisfaction of knowing that they need not wait till the caprice of a Creditor shall let them loose, or till the fortuitous arrival of an Insolvent Act shall restore their freedom: they know that their confinement will endure but for twelve months, and though an incarceration of several years might be a cruel punishment for a slight improvidence, yet imprisonment for a twelve-month is perhaps no more than a salutary correction.

for the original error. For after all, though our law considers the affairs of Debtor and Creditor merely as civil matters, we cannot help feeling that there are cases continually occurring, as well among necessitous persons as among extravagant people of fashion, where there is a degree of criminality, as well as of civil neglect, on the part of the person contracting a debt: and the good of the state seems to require, that wherever a delinquency exists, which is likely, by its own immediate effects, or by its example, to injure society, society shall receive some provision against other delinquencies of a similar kind, by the punishment of the delinquent himself. There are, it is true, a great number of cases in which debts are very innocently contracted, and in which, nevertheless, a failure on the part of the Debtor is followed by imprisonment: but it will not be fair to argue, that, in these cases, an innocent man is punished; for his confinement is not a punishment, but a privation, which, on failure of certain engagements, he has voluntarily undertaken to endure. We are well convinced, that to take away the liability of arrest in all cases of debt under twenty pounds, would be to effect a material mischief; for it perpetually happens that loose and irregular persons, whom honour would never persuade to pay their debts at an inconvenience to themselves, will do justice to their Creditors rather than be carried to prison. The rod has its benefit, even while it only hangs in sight; perhaps it is not frequently necessary to use it; but the moment its use is forbidden, almost every body will need to be chastised.

We cannot conclude this article without applauding the nature of those plans of improvement, which the party now absent from power have always had most warmly at heart. Other Ministers have directed their attention more successfully to conquest abroad, and studied the art of dazzling the people; but these statesmen have sought to increase our comforts at home, and endeavoured to benefit their country by solid grants rather than by pomp or show.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XX.

THE INDEPENDENT WHIG.

The other day a Mr. Nalder, who holds the office of City Marshal, was summoned on a charge of misbehaviour in his capacity of overseer of the watch. The comfort of society certainly requires that there be such people as watchmen, as long as there continue to be such people as thieves: but when the public sentinels, instead of preventing robbery or securing robbers for the preservation of peace, think fit to disturb peace by attacking honest men as they walk quietly along the foot-path, it is high time that they should be obliged to make some reparation for their drunken tyranny. This Mr. Nalder having created a riot at a time when he was on duty for the purpose of checking riot, was obliged to make suitable submissions, and decorum was properly satisfied.

What shall we say of those literary watchmen, or rather those illiterate watchmen, who assume to themselves the credit of protecting the rights of the people by the pen, from the encroachments of those who are accused of desiring to subvert those rights by the sword? Shall we not say, that if they prove themselves unjust accusers, they immediately become criminals? Shall we not say, that if for private emolument (no matter whether it arise from the circulation of their publications, or from the bribes of party), they prostitute the columns of their Newspapers to the factions of faction, they are to all intents and purposes the traitors, and not the supporters, of their country's cause? May we not safely assert, that they, like the patrole whom we just now spoke, deserve to be punished for raising disturbance under pretence of keeping the peace?

Yet this is the line of conduct pursued by the Sunday Newspaper called The Independent Whig. We have found that Paper warm in its abuse of almost every thing that is respectable in country, for rank, for situation, for talent, or for wealth: Fox and his party, Mr. Pitt and his party, all alike have been denounced by the Editors of this trumpery Print, as persons totally without sense, or totally without principle. Rational and moderate men are decried as fools and impostors: and the gods of the new idolatry are Sir Francis Burdett and the Emperor Bonaparte. Sir Francis Burdett is a man, whom we should be sorry to set down in terms so contemptuous as those which the Conductors of The Independent Whig are in the habit of applying to all Statesmen whom they do not like: but Sir Francis Burdett is a man whose doctrines to us appear deserving disapprobation, deep, and qualified by no consideration, except that respect which is always due to a gentleman against whom we contend, and to our own characters. Sir Francis Burdett had the misfortune to begin his career in an age when the moral and political worlds were distracted by a thousand wonderful and wild speculations: when revolutionary madness ran like wild-fire among the people, and those alone who had been deluded into a conspiracy for the disturbance of their country, were considered as their country's real friends. It is easy to conceive how lively an impression all these strange opinions, and the strange events that seemed to back those opinions, must necessarily have made upon a young and ardent mind, heated to a degree as to be capable of receiving any direction that should be given to it by the inequalities of the anvil on which it was thrown. At that time, when almost every body who was not an actual courtier or alarmist, was in some degree friendly to the principles of the French revolution, and was inclined to hope that such a revolution must produce some benefits to other nations of Europe, Sir Francis Burdett was seen a remarkable man. But when, by degrees, the generality of mistaken theorists, who had hailed in licentiousness the birth of liberty, began to discover the error of their politics, and when their sentiments began to subside once more into their regular channel, along which they had been accustomed to flow, the few persons who after the palpable discovery of all the modern chimeras, ventured to adhere to their chimeras undismayed by the strength of such adverse reason and experience, attracted considerable notice, either for their genius, at least for their pertinacity—if not for their courage, at any rate for their rashness. These were most of them persons, who having nothing to lose, and nothing to gain much, were little inclined to abandon the cause of revolution, the only chance which could bring them to the top of the wheel: but it was a singular circumstance that among these wretched adventurers, a man of rank and fortune, whose talents were of no contemptible class, and whose situation could not be improved by any change, should venture to come forward a conspicuous leader. All the miseries of the Continent, the moment before our eyes, all the experience of ages in the past, and all the abstract maxims of philosophy that have been growing into indisputable truths for so many centuries, have been able to convince Sir Francis Burdett of the madness of chiefs of unrestrained liberty, nor of the absolute impossibility of universal equalization. Water, which is a compound of globules, will always find its level: but society, of which the particles are not so regularly round and so completely [illegible] cannot be preserved for an instant in such a condition [illegible].

It is certainly to be desired that there be persons of consequence, and talent, who shall oppose themselves to dangerous innovations which an ambitious [illegible] seek to establish; but it is not necessary that [illegible] terrify the country by constantly informing the people

England is on the brink of destruction. Impending ruin has been held out as a probable event, ever since mobs had ears to listen, and orators had tongues to declaim: the country is not ruined yet, but the people still confide in their declaimers; and such men as Sir Francis Burdett continue to present a deplorable reverse of Cassandra's fate. She saw destruction approaching, but was cursed with unbelieving hearers: the modern preachers see no evils except in their own imaginations, but the country is cursed with hearers that believe them. It is not, it cannot be to the honour or the advantage of Englishmen, to suck, indiscriminately, all the futile prophecy of approaching danger, all the unjust accusation of past mismanagement, which Sir Francis Burdett, and that mouth-piece of his dogmas, The Independent Whig, may think fit to vomit forth. The Paper abounds with dissertations on the prosecutions for a Libel that threaten the Editors; and we are inclined to congratulate the country on an event that seems likely to staunch the last remaining ulcer that the disease of Jacobinism has left behind it.

On the merits of The Independent Whig's other hero, Bonaparte, it is unnecessary to dilate at this time of day. Bonaparte is constantly held up by the Conductors of this Paper as an example of greatness to be copied by our Ministers; and yet when our Ministers, in humble imitation of Bonaparte, attempt such a measure as the attack at Copenhagen, they are not only reproached by these scribblers with all the indignation that a sense of justice can awaken, but vilified with all the abuse that the vocabulary of Billingsgate can furnish.

When our Ministers shall have taken the advice of The Independent Whig, and imitated Bonaparte in other achievements, we shall expect to see the country really reduced to that state in which the Editors of this Paper delight to represent it. The attack on Copenhagen already has wounded our honour; a further pursuit of the system which dictated that plan, will certainly destroy it. When these factious people, who misguide the people by their periodical nonsense, have persuaded a large body of men that the country is ruined, perhaps the ruin of the country will not in reality be very far distant. A turbulent mob will then begin to rectify abuses, and the Proprietors of The Independent Whig may "ride in the whirlwind, and direct the "storm." Nobody will deny that the Executive Power of The Independent Whig will be well matched with the legislative genius of porter drinkers, for the Editor may be, indeed, as Pope has expressed it,

"A decent Priest, where monkeys are the Gods!"

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH, DUTCH, GOTTENBURGH, GERMAN, AND HAMBURGH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, APRIL 28.—From Algiers the following official Report has been received:—

"The measures pursued by the Dey of Algiers towards the Europeans, become every day more violent. The Dey having scarcely the Government in his hands, not being assured of the fidelity of his troops, and even the confirmation of his office from the Grand Signior, his Sovereign, not being arrived, and being involved in a bloody war with the Dey of Tunis, thought he might, in spite of the difficulties of his situation, levy tribute upon all nations.—On the 22d instant, he made a demand of the Swedish, Danish, and Dutch Consuls, that they should bring him their presents; and he required of the Consul of America 18,000 double piastres, in order to indemnify him for the loss of nine Algerines taken in an American vessel. The Consul pretended, that the crew of the vessel had thrown the men overboard, as they were on the point of being boarded by one of his cruisers.—The Consul of Sweden immediately agreed to the present.—On the 23d, the three Consuls of Denmark, Holland, and America, were summoned to the Palace.—The Consul of Holland said, he expected instructions from his Government, and that he could not, till he received those instructions, make any present. On this the Dey caused it to be intimated to him, that unless he immediately, on the arrival of his messenger, received his present, he should put his children into irons and send them to labour.—The Consul of America had not yet received official tidings of the fact of which the Dey had complained, and thought that he could not, without the order of his Government, pay the 18,000 piastres.—The Dey answered him, that unless he should pay the sum within four days, he should cast him in irons, or he must deliver to him nine Americans, whom he would hang up at the gate of Bab Azouw.—Mr. Ulrich, Consul of Denmark, making a representation of the state of his country, said, that the vessel which contained his presents, had been seized by the English and confiscated, and that the English Agent at Algiers himself would testify this: the Consul solicited time of the Government; but the Dey paying no respect to the character of an Agent, speaking in the name of his master, caused him to be seized by the Officers of Justice in the midst of the Palace, and taken to prison instantly, amidst the shouts of a barbarous populace. Those who could enter into this horrid prison, saw this worthy man among the slaves, in his official dress, and loaded with a chain of sixty pounds weight, which Mr. Ulrich bore with fortitude and courage: he merely recommended to his friends the care of his wife and five children.—At length the Dey resolved, on the earnest entreaties of all the European Consuls, to set the Danish Consul at liberty; and while he was occupied working with all the slaves, they came and took off his chain.—What security is there against the renewal of these acts of violence?—All the slaves here are treated with the most horrid cruelty: 450 Portuguese are shut up in prison. The Court of Lisbon delayed sending the tribute. The Government has not sent them any relief, and they are in extreme wretchedness. The Officers, as well as sailors, are condemned to labour, and loaded with ignominy.—A great number of Neapolitans, also slaves, are not in a less pitiable situation: and the Dey, who expects to conquer Tunis in the first campaign, hopes to make a booty of 3,000 more European slaves, whose ransom he will fix very high. Since he has been forced to give up all the slaves, who were subjects of the Emperor Napoleon, it seems that he is resolved to make his system of robbery press harder upon the other foreigners."

PARIS, MAY 4.—The developement of the events in Spain, which have drawn the attention of all Europe upon that kingdom, is approaching; and we rejoice that the termination of this great cause is not left to either of the contending parties, but, on the contrary, to a Monarch, whose integrity, sagacity, and power, render every evil purpose, error, and opposition, impossible. It is with joy that yesterday the public became acquainted with the following documents, through the Official Paper:—

Report to his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke of Berg, Lieutenant of the Emperor, Commander of his Forces in Spain.

"MONSEIGNEUR!—Agreeably to the commands of your Imperial Highness, I repaired with the letter of your Highness to the Queen of Etruria, at Aranjuez. It was eight o'clock in the morning; the Queen was still in bed; she rose immediately, and bade me enter. I delivered your letter to her. She begged me to wait a little, and said she would go and read it with the King and Queen. Half an hour afterwards, I saw the Queen of Etruria enter with the King and Queen of Spain.

"His Majesty said, that he thanked your Imperial Highness for the share you had taken in his affliction, which was the greater as his own son was the author of it. The King said, that the revolution had been effected by forgery and corruption, and that the principal actors were his son and M. Cabellero, Minister of Justice; that he had been compelled to abdicate the throne, in order to save the lives of himself and his Queen; that he knows that but for this, they would have been murdered in the course of the night; that the conduct of the Prince of Asturias was more shocking, seeing that himself (the King) having perceived his desire to reign, and being himself near 60 years of age, had agreed to surrender the crown to him, on his marriage taking place with a French Princess, which the King ardently desired.

"The King added to this, that the Prince of the Asturias was desirous that he and the Queen should repair to Badajoz, on the frontiers of Portugal; that he had found means to inform him that the climate of that country did not suit him; that he begged him to permit his choosing another place; that he sought to obtain permission of the Emperor to purchase an estate in France, where he might end his days. The Queen told me she had begged of her son to postpone their journey to Badajoz; that she had not procured this, and that the journey was to take place on the ensuing Monday.

"At the moment I was departing from their Majesties, the King said to me, 'I have written to the Emperor, in whose hand I repose my fate.'

"I wished to send my letter by a courier, but I know no surer means of sending it than by yours. The King left me then in order to repair to his Cabinet. He soon returned with the following Letters (Nos. 1 and 2) in his hand, which he gave me, and added these words—'My situation is most deplorable; they have seized the Prince de la Paz, and will put him to death; he has committed no other crime than that he has at all times been attached to me.'—He added, there were no efforts which he would not have attempted to save the life of his unhappy friend, but that he had found the whole world deaf to his entreaties, and bent on vengeance; that the death of the Prince de la Paz would draw after it his own, and that he should not survive him.

"Aranjuez, March 23, 1808. "B. De. Mouthon."

No. I.—LETTER FROM KING CARLOS IV. TO THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON.

"SIR, MY BROTHER.—Your Majesty will assuredly hear with pain, of the events which have taken place at Aranjuez, and their consequences: you will not, without sympathy, see a King who has been compelled to resign his throne, throw himself into the arms of a great Monarch his ally, placing every thing in his protection, who alone can fix his happiness, and that of his whole family, and his trusty and beloved subjects. Under the pressure of the moment, and amid the clashing of weapons, and the cries of a rebellious guard, I found that I had to choose between my life and death, and that my death would be followed by that of the Queen: I was compelled to abdicate the throne: but to-day peace is restored, and full of confidence in the generosity and genius of the Great Man, who has at all times declared himself my friend, I have taken my resolution to resign myself into his hands, and await what he shall resolve on my fate, that of the Queen, and of the Prince de la Paz.

"I address myself to your Majesty, and protest against the events which took place at Aranjuez, and against my dethronement. I rely with confidence, and altogether upon the cordiality and friendship of your Majesty, praying that God may have you in his holy keeping. Sir, my Brother,

"Your Royal and Imperial Majesty's "Affectionate Brother and Friend,

No. II.

"I protest and declare, that my Decree of the 19th of March, in which I renounce my Crown in favour of my son, is a deed to which I was compelled, in order to prevent greater calamities, and spare the blood of my beloved subjects. It is therefore to be considered as of no authority.

(Signed) "I, The King."

BAYONNE, APRIL 23.—Yesterday, at seven in the evening, her Majesty the Empress arrived here. The Administration, the Guard of Honour, and several regiments of cavalry, went to meet her. The whole of the garrison was under arms, and stood in two long rows in the streets. The cannon of the citadel was discharged, and the town was illuminated. Their Majesties alighted at the Castle of Mernc, where the Emperor takes up his residence. To-day the Empress received a visit from the Prince of the Asturias.

The day before yesterday the Prince de la Paz arrived here. He dwells in a castle near the town. To-morrow the King and Queen of Spain are expected.

SPAIN.

MADRID, APRIL 5, 1808.—His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke of Berg, having intimated to his Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, first Secretary of State, that his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French and King of Italy, would be pleased in the possession of the sword that Francis I. King of France, surrendered in the famous battle of Pavia, in the reign of the Emperor Charles V. in Spain, which was kept with due estimation in the Royal Armory, since the year 1525, declaring that it might be thus represented to our Lord the King. His Majesty being informed of this, and desirous of availing himself of every opportunity to testify to his intimate Ally the Emperor of the French, his high regard for his august person, and the admiration his unheard of deeds inspire him with, immediately ordered the afore-mentioned sword to be remitted to his Imperial and Royal Majesty, and thought that the most worthy and respectable channel would be his Serene Highness the Grand Duke of Berg, who was brought up by his side, and in the same school, and rendered illustrious by his prowess and military talents, and more deserving than any body to be charged with so precious a deposit, and to transmit it into the hands of his Imperial Majesty. In consequence thereof, and of the Royal Order which was given to his Excellency the Marquis of Astorga, Groom-Major to his Majesty, the conveyance of the sword to the lodgings of his Imperial Highness was arranged with great pomp and ceremony.

"ST. ANTONIO, APRIL 22.

"Our young King set off from Victoria on Tuesday last, and next day reached Bayonne, where he was politely received (Como Hermano) by the Emperor of France, with whom he and his Committee dined on Thursday; but the spirits of the people here have been since damped, Ferdinand VII. not being yet recognized by Bonaparte as King of Spain. It was likewise reported that the old King (Carlos IV.) has protested against the abdication of the Crown, and he is expected at Bayonne in a few days."

"Saturday Afternoon, April 24.

"The letters by the Castile post are this moment delivered, and bring the extraordinary news of the Prince of the Peace having been taken out of the place of his confinement by orders of the French General Murat, and is now on his way (under a guard of forty dragoons) to Bayonne, for which place the old King was preparing to set out, which confirms the above advices from France; and, it is much feared, that these circumstances may cause a great commotion in this country in a short time. God grant we may be mistaken," &c.

"Monday Evening, April 25.

"Advice is this moment arrived here, that the Prince of the Peace actually passed through Victoria early this morning, under a guard of nearly 200 French horse soldiers; and that the old King and Queen are to sleep at Burgos to-morrow evening, on their way to Bayonne.

SWEDEN.

GOTTENBURGH, MAY 6.—The accounts by the post from Calmar and Carlscrona, on the 2d, respecting the landing of the French and Russians in the island of Gothland, appear to have been exaggerated. By the last letters from thence, we learn, that instead of 10,000 men, 3,000 only were landed on the island, who were all Russians. They sailed from Lieuhan on the 21st of April, in nine ships. Of the truth of this, a Captain from Liebau has made oath, before the government of Stockholm.

This morning arrived the Eurydus frigate, the Hon. Capt. Dundas, having on board his Royal Highness the Duke D'Angoulesme and suite. There is nothing to-day from Norway. A report was current yesterday, that a considerable body of Swedes, 500, had been surrounded by 3000 Norwegians and taken prisoners; but this is not yet confirmed.

MAY 7.—A messenger who has just arrived from Stockholm, brings the intelligence that the Russians have already left the Island of Gothland, after plundering, and, as the island was rich, taking away a great booty.

MAY 8.—A fleet of seven transports, with arms and ammunition, have arrived here from Plymouth, bound for Gefle.

STOCKHOLM, MAY 2.—By a report made by Lord Lieutenant Klint, on the 23d of last month, his Royal Majesty was informed, that, on the preceding day, the Russians made good a landing on the south-sea coast of Gothland, in the parish of Grottinghe. Their strength is estimated at about 2000 men.

According to intelligence received from Oland, that island was taken possession of a month ago by some Russian troops, who were, however, soon after recalled in the greatest hurry. But they have now landed there a second time. Reports are current in that island, uncontradicted by the Russian Officers, that their army in Finland has sustained a very considerable loss in an attack made on the fortress of Sweaborg.

BRAZILS.

ORDINANCE OF THE PRINCE REGENT.

TO COUNT DE PONTE, GOVERNOR AND CAPTAIN-GENERAL OF THE PROVINCE OF BAHIA.

"FRIEND,—I the Prince Regent send you, as my well-beloved, greeting: Duly considering the report which you have made to me, on the condition of my subjects and my royal revenue, on account of the present critical state of public affairs of Europe, and being desirous to give on that important subject a speedy decision, in order to stop the further progress of evils of such magnitude, &c. I do herewith provisionally ordain, until a general system of regulations, respecting the matters in question shall have been arranged, as follows:

"1. That at the Custom-houses in the Brazils, all kinds of goods, merchandize, and commodities, brought either on board of foreign ships, belonging to subjects of such Powers as are considered to be on terms of amity and peace with my Royal Crown, or in vessels belonging to my subjects, shall be admitted on payment of twenty-four per cent. import duty, consisting of twenty per cent. consolidated customs, and four per cent. additional duty already established; the collection of the said customs to be effected in the same manner as has hitherto been done at the said Custom-house, wine, brandy, and sweet oil shall pay double the duty that has hitherto been levied on the said articles.

"2. That it shall be lawful not only for my own subjects, but also for those of the Powers above-mentioned, to export to such ports as they shall deem expedient, for the benefit of trade and agriculture, which I feel anxious to promote, every species of colonial commodities and produce, with the exception of Brazil wood and other articles, the exportation of which is already prohibited, on payment of the same export duty as has hitherto been established in the respective provinces; all laws, royal edicts, and other ordinances, which hitherto prohibited in this State of the Brazils a mutual intercourse and maritime trade between my subjects and foreign nations, remaining until farther suspended and without force. All which you will cause to be carried into effect with that activity and zeal which I expect from you. (Signed)

Bahai, Jan. 28. THE PRINCE.

Be it carried into execution and registered, and the necessary orders for that purpose expedited. (Signed)

Bahai, Jan. 29, 1808. COUNT DE PONTE.

FROM THE GIBRALTAR MAILS.

APRIL 27.—Last night the Phœbe frigate, Capt. Oswald, arrived from Lord Collingwood's fleet, which the Phœbe left off Minorca, twelve days ago. By the Phœbe we learn that the Rochefort and Toulon squadrons, after having effected the object of their expedition, in landing twelve thousand men at Corfu and the Seven Islands, had, after visiting Minorca, returned to Toulon.

The Spanish squadron at Minorca declined going to Toulon along with the French, and they were at anchor in the harbour of Mahon, when the Phœbe left Minorca.

Lord Cochrane landed on the N.W. part of Minorca, and had blown up a fort which had been constructed by General Fox, for the defence of Ronaldsend, where it was situated.

Lord Collingwood intended returning to Sicily again, with the fleet under his command.

The Grasshopper, Capt. Searle, this morning brought in two Spanish prizes, laden with indigo and cochineal, bound from Vera Cruz to Cadiz, supposed to be worth 30,000*l.* also two Spanish gun-boats taken off Cadiz.

The Electra sloop of war had been lost off Sicily—the crew saved.

APRIL 29.—Yesterday afternoon the Volontaire frigate, and the convoy from England of fifty sail, arrived here. The Duke of Orleans landed from the Volontaire, and was received with a royal salute from the garrison and shipping.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, MAY 9.

The Irish Spirit Drawback Suspension Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 10.

The Irish Clergy Residence Bill, and Irish Glebe House Bill, were received from the Commons, and read a first time.

Petitions from the Debtors in the Gaols of Liverpool and Lancaster, were presented by Lord Derby, and ordered to lie on the table.

REVERSION BILL.

Lord HAWKESBURY moved the Order of the Day for the second reading of the Reversion Bill. His Lordship briefly expressed his approbation of the principle of the present Bill, as contrasted with that which had been recently rejected. This Bill was properly connected with the proceedings of the Committee of Finance. It might, perhaps, be conceived, that pending its inquiries, there could be no disposition on the part of Ministers to advise his Majesty to grant any office in reversion: but if it was admissible not to leave the matter to their discretion, he felt that a proceeding like the present was much less objectionable than that of a separate Address from either House of Parliament.

Lord REDESDALE did not feel his objections to the measure in any degree removed by what had fallen from the Noble Secretary of State. Looking at the circumstances in which it originated, and under which it was persevered in, he considered it as the first step to a series of innovations which might lead to the destruction of our present admirable Constitution, and the erection of a Republican Government on its ruins.

Lord HOLLAND supported the Bill. Though it did not go the length of the original measure, he was grateful to Ministers for the part which they took upon this occasion. He hailed it as a victory and triumph over that faction of secret influence which had pervaded the whole of the present reign, and perpetually stept in to intercept and blast the hopes and wishes of the people. There was not an administration for the last forty years but had some time or other felt the force of this secret influence, and the present, or any other ministry, should have his zealous assistance in counteracting it.

The question was put and carried without a division; and the Bill was accordingly read a second time.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 11.

The Militia Pay Bill, Militia Subalterns Bill, and Irish Militia and Stamp Duty Bills were read a first time.

Lord Hawkesbury delivered a Message from his Majesty, recommending it to their Lordships to concur in making a suitable provision for the Duchess of Brunswick. The Message was ordered to be taken into consideration.

The Scotch Judicature Bill was read a third time. A clause was adopted by way of rider, on the motion of the Lord Chancellor, for distributing the Clerks of the Court of Session between the two new Courts into which it is to be divided by the Bill. The Bill passed, and was ordered to the Commons.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 12.

The English and Irish Militia Bills, Irish Stamp Duty Bill, and Horse-hire Bill, were read a second time.

Lord HAWKESBURY moved the order of the day for taking into consideration his Majesty's Message respecting the Duchess of Brunswick. The language of that communication was such as to leave him very little to say on the present occasion. Their Lordships were acquainted with the unfortunate circumstances which compelled her Royal Highness to seek an asylum in this country. The high character and merits of her illustrious husband were also too well known to them, to require any observation from him. The cause in which he had lost his life might, under the circumstances of the times, be properly considered as the cause of this country. This consideration, as well as that of consanguinity, weighed with his Majesty in his desire to make a suitable provision for the declining years of her Royal Highness. His Lordship concluded with moving an Address, assuring his Majesty of the disposition of that House to concur in promoting the object of the Message.

Lord LAUDERDALE said it would have been as well if the Noble Secretary of State, in recommending the object of the message, had abstained from adverting to any other consideration than that the Duchess of Brunswick was his Majesty's sister. That was the only ground on which he could assent to the Address; for if the House were to act on the principle that she was to be provided for because she was the widow of a foreign Prince who had been stripped of his territories, such a precedent might in the present situation of Europe, go the length of entailing the most serious burthens on the people of this country. With respect to the Duke of Brunswick, there was a very considerable difference of opinion as to the merits of his conduct during the latter period of his life. It could not be admitted that Prussia, at the time the Duke received his fatal wound, was fighting the battles of this country; on the contrary, she was then in actual hostility to us. The allowance to be proposed for the Duchess was 10,000*l.*; but it should be recollected, that she had a pension on the Irish establishment, and enjoyed, besides the interest of her dowry, which was secured in trust in this country. He alluded to these particulars, not for the purpose of objecting to the intended provision as too large, but for the purpose of stating that if it was not so, the allowance to the five Princesses was too small. The Duchess, who was the daughter of the Prince of Wales, would have 14 or 15,000*l.* a-year, while five daughters of a Sovereign would have only 30,000*l.* a-year among them. This regulation was totally at variance with the practice which had hitherto prevailed, in apportioning the establishments of the Royal Family.

The Address was then agreed to nem. diss. and ordered to be presented by the Lords with the white staves.

THE REVERSION BILL.

Lord Lauderdale blamed the Committee of Finance for the share which they had in frittering away the merits of the original Bill, and for their delay in proceeding to investigate the expenditure of the Naval and Military Departments. It was to these branches of our establishment that his Majesty's Speech pointed out hopes for efficient saving, and not to sinecure places, with which he understood the Committee was at present occupied. His Lordship then argued at some length to show, that though the Government Offices required reform and regulation, it was a complete deception of the Public to hold out any expectation of great savings by the abolition of any of them. On the contrary, he was firmly persuaded that the effect of abolishing even sinecure places would be, to add considerably in the way of pensions to the public burthens.

After some further debate the Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 13.

The Irish Assessed Taxes Bill, and the Bills for an issue of 1,500,000*l.* and 3,000,000*l.* in Exchequer Bills, were received from the Commons and read a first time.

Lord Ellenborough moved the second reading of the Debtors Relief Bill.

Lord Moira objected to the Bill, as being very little calculated to remedy the grievances under which many of the unfortunate class of persons to whom it applied, laboured. He could not agree in the principle upon which a year's imprisonment was, in all cases, to precede the relief. Some distinction should be made between the case of the fraudulent and the unfortunate.

Lord Erskine and the Lord Chancellor, while they panegyrized the benevolence of Lord Moira's character, coincided in thinking, with Lord Ellenborough, that the relief afforded by the present Bill could not be carried farther without danger to the general system of trade.

The Bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, MAY 9.

Lord Binning gave notice, that he would on Monday next move that the Report of the Sugar Distillery Committee be taken into consideration.

The Irish Clergy Residence Bill, and the Irish Glebe House Bill were read a third time and passed.

Lord Folkestone moved that the papers, which were presented on Wednesday last, respecting the Droits of Admiralty, be printed.—Ordered.

Mr. Rose moved for an account of the total amount of the Crown Revenue of England and Wales, together with the charges of management, and the net proceeds for the last ten years.—Ordered.

Mr. W. Taylor agreed to put off his motion respecting the failure of the Expedition to the Dardanelles, which stood for Thursday, till Thursday se'nnight.

Mr. Grattan postponed presenting the Catholic Petition till the 25th of May.

Mr. Calcraft, in making his motion respecting the Rochefort Blockading Squadron, complained, that all the Papers which he had moved for on the 3d of March had not been presented; but, notwithstanding, he had full and substantial evidence from those now before the House, to prove the escape of the French squadron was entirely owing to the misconduct of the Admiralty in not supplying Sir R. Strachan with provisions. On the 30th of October Sir Richard wrote very pressingly to Lord Gardner for provisions, and the Admiralty, from some cause, sent only a partial supply; and, on the 18th of December, he wrote, that he had only eight weeks supply on board; and, in a subsequent date, only three weeks. It is true that, in the mean time, the Admiralty had given orders for the Superb and Spencer to carry out supplies on the 21st of December; but these vessels did not arrive till the 15th of January; and the gallant Admiral, finding he was much neglected, deviated from the rules of the service, and sent copies of his letters to the Commander-in-Chief direct to the Board, stating his extreme [illegible] of necessaries, which must convince any rational [illegible] he could follow the French if they attempted [illegible]. The inference was, that Sir Richard was obliged [illegible] to endeavour to meet with victuallers [illegible] for the relief of his squadron; and during his absence the French escaped, when he was not in any condition to follow them. On these grounds it was his intention to move certain Resolutions, of which he sent a copy to the Secretary of the Admiralty a few days ago, and to add another of censure on the conduct of the Board, for exposing the gallant Commander in this embarrassed situation.

The Hon. W. Pole confessed his surprize, after the Papers produced, at the Hon. Gentleman persevering in his motion; he said, he should prove by the letters of Lord Gardner, and by those of the gallant Sir Richard himself, that he had not quitted the blockade of Rochefort from a scarcity of provisions, or any deficiency in stores, but from a series of hard weather. Neither was it true that Sir Richard had drawn any supplies from the fleet blockading Ferrol, as there was no document to that effect in the possession of the Admiralty, and he did not believe that such a document existed any where. He should also endeavour to shew, that Sir R. Strachan's squadron was not in that miserable condition in which the Hon. Gentleman stated it to have been, and that fact he would make out from the letters of the gallant Admiral himself. These letters would prove that the gallant Admiral (Sir R. Strachan) had been forced from his station by bad weather, and that he did not leave it in order to look after victuallers from England. He then proceeded to read the facts from the letters of Sir Richard himself. After he had left Rochefort, through the severity of the weather, he bent his course towards Ferrol. Sir Richard passed the squadron off Ferrol, only noticing it by telegraph, and even the garrison of Gibraltar, without demanding provisions. Mr. Pole proceeded at great length to quote from the papers on the table the various supplies sent off with the utmost promptitude by the board of Admiralty. These supplies, however, were in many instances prevented from sailing, through the long continued tempestuous weather at the time they ought to have been on their way to Sir Richard. It was true Sir Richard had been out for six months; but the supplies got to him in ample time, and he would repeat that the gallant Admiral had not been compelled to abandon the blockade of Rochefort from any want of provisions, but entirely through the rough and tempestuous weather he unluckily encountered. To prove this he stated an account of the amount of supplies sent out, consisting of potatoes, onions, live bullocks, and provisions of every description, part of which were destined to Rochefort, L'Orient, and Ferrol. After some allusions to points of minor importance, he concluded by moving the previous question, on the six first Resolutions of the Hon. Gentleman on the facts, and on the 7th, the censure on the Board of Admiralty, he gave his positive negative.

The House divided, for the motion 69, against it 146, majority 77.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 10.

Mr. Montague, Chairman of the Grampound Election Committee, reported, that the Sitting Members were not duly elected, but that the petitioners, ——— Holmes, Esq. and the Hon. Cochrane Johnston, ought to have been returned. The Deputy Clerk of the Crown attended, and amended the return.

On the Motion of Mr. Mellish, the Bill preventing the damaging of raw hides and skins, was read a third time and passed.

The Militia Pay Bills (Great Britain and Ireland), the Militia Adjutants, and Militia Subaltern Officers Bill, were read a third a third time and passed.

Mr. Lushington moved that there be laid before the House a copy of the proceedings in the Court of King's Bench, in a cause, Paxton and others v. Popham and another.

Sir Home Popham said, he had no objection to the production of a copy of the Record now moved for. It related entirely to a private transaction which took place twenty years ago. At that time a proposal had been made to him to enter into a certain speculation, by some individuals, whose integrity he could not question; and although Mr. M'Arthur and himself had been unsuccessful in that speculation, and a dispute had arisen between them, he had uniformly endeavoured to bring the subject to an amicable adjustment, being convinced that mutual concessions ought to be made. He meant to adjust the matter in dispute by arbitration, in the most amicable manner. He was rather surprised at the Hon. Gentleman having gone into the subject of l'Etrusco, as there were precedents of such cases to be found. In another case in the Common Pleas, Sir Home said, his Attorney had put in a plea which had cost him a considerable sum of money.

Mr. Lushington said, that with regard to the last action, it was the first time of his hearing any thing of it. He begged the gallant and Hon. Captain not to imagine that he meant to criminate him in regard to that plea; but he wished merely, as an illegal transaction had taken place, and as Mr. M'Arthur and the Hon. Captain were equally concerned in it, to have the matter fully explained. He did not wish, at present, again to go into the private history of the ship l'Etrusco; but should only say, that his great objection lay to the granting to the gallant Captain remuneration for the capture of that vessel as being highly improper, and as subversive of all the laws and regulations relating to Captures. The Motion was carried.

Mr. Long moved for a Copy of the Treasury Minutes of the 7th of August, 1804; and for a Copy of the Opinion of the King's Proctor, on the Memorial of Sir Home Popham, praying to be reimbursed by receiving back the proceeds of the ship l'Etrusco.—Ordered.

The Three Millions and the One Million Five Hundred Thousand Pounds Exchequer Bills Bill, were committed.

In a Committee of Ways and Means, a Resolution was agreed to, granting a duty of two shillings on every pound weight of corks imported to Great Britain.

Mr. Perceval brought down a Message from his Majesty, stating, that the Sovereign felt it necessary to acquaint the House of Commons, that in consequence of the Defeat of the King of Prussia by the French Armies, two years ago, and the Death of his Serene Highness the Duke of Brunswick, his Majesty's sister, the Duchess of Brunswick, had come to England. His Majesty recommended it, therefore, to the liberality of his faithful Commons, to consider of the best means of enabling that Duchess to maintain her rank in a manner most suited to her feelings; and also to his Majesty's regard for his sister.—On the Motion of Mr. Perceval, the Message was referred to a Committee of Supply.

Mr. Biddulph rose to move for the appointment of a Committee to consider how far the Act of the first of the King, respecting the demised revenues of the Crown, had been complied with.

Mr. Rose resisted the Motion, stating, that the amount of the demised revenues came only to 86,000*l*. There were deductions from that amount of 2,400*l*. for management; the grants charged on it amounted to 9,000*l*. and there was an annual sum of 23,000*l*. for improving the woods and forests. These charges left the clear revenue 19,072*l*. In the course of the present reign, this revenue had been applied to the aggregate fund, and the money remained in the Bank until it should be paid into the Exchequer. He thought the Motion improper until the Finance Committee should report upon the subject, which would, in due time, come under its investigation. He therefore opposed the Motion. The House divided—Ayes 12, Noes 37.

Lord Porchester spoke against the re-commitment of the Stipendary Curates Bill, on the general ground of its inequality, in which he was supported by Mr. Windham and Dr Lawrence.

The Motion was supported by Mr. Perceval and the Solicitor-General at some length. The House divided—for the Motion 94, against it 11. Majority 83.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 11.

Mr. Mellish presented a petition from the Watermen on the River Thames, against the projected bridge near the Savoy, which was referred to the Committee of that Bridge.

Mr. Wharton brought up the Report of the Cork Committee Importation Bill, which recommended a duty of 2s. 3d. per lb. on imported manufactured Corks.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, Mr. Wharton in the Chair, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after adverting to the misfortunes which befel the late Duke of Brunswick in falling a sacrifice to the defence of Prussia, said his Majesty was desirous of providing for his sister in a manner suitable to her condition, he therefore concluded by moving the sum of 10,000*l*. per annum to the Duchess of Brunswick, which, after a few words from Mr. Whitbread, Lord Morpeth, and General Tarleton, was agreed to.

The following sums moved for by Mr. Huskisson, were also agreed to:—25,068*l*. 6*s*. 3*d*. for liquidating the expence of the Improvements under several Acts of Parliament, in and near both Houses of Parliament; 16,320*l*. for the Sierra Leone Establishment; 13,580*l*. 4*s*. 2*d*. for Botany Bay; 600*l*. for Dominica; 1090*l*. for Bermuda; 8700*l*. for the Bahamas; 1985*l*. for Newfoundland; 2060*l*. for Cape Breton; 3100*l*. for Prince Edward's Island; 10,105*l*. for Nova Scotia; 2500*l*. for New Brunswick; 8430*l*. for Upper Canada; 8190*l*. for the payment of certain Annuities; 14,420*l*. for Bills from New South Wales; 6023*l*. for repairing the Roads in North Britain; 10,240*l*. 14*s*. for repairing Roads and Bridges in the Highlands of Scotland; 2911*l* 19*s*. for Printing the Journals; 20,000*l*. for Law Charges; 4,240,000*l*. for paying off Exchequer Bills; and 5000*l*. to the Levant Company.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill for the better Collection of the Assessed Taxes, it was his intention to simplify the Collection, and put it, if possible, out of the power of either the Inspector or Surveyor to make vexatious surcharges. Frequent complaints had been made of the conduct of such men, and he had no doubt but that the complaints were truly stated and founded on facts. In this Bill directions would be given to the Commissioners to see that they did their duty properly, and to have the tax collected half-yearly, giving every facility to those who thought themselves aggrieved in cases of appeal, and also to extend the period; and, if the Surveyors and Inspectors were found guilty of vexatiously surcharging, the Bill provided that they should pay a penalty of 100*l*. or three times the surcharge, at the option of the person so surcharged, with double costs, when sued in any of the Courts below, so as to prevent them from oppressing the poor, and if found guilty to be discharged from office. —It was likewise in this Bill his intention to appoint special Commissioners to examine the Books of the Surveyors, Inspectors, and Clerks, and to call a meeting of the rest of the Commissioners in order to investigate their conduct.

Leave was granted to bring in the Bill.

Sir Francis Burdett said, at the last Election for Westminster some persons had put him (Sir Francis) in nomination as a Candidate, without his knowledge; in a case of this kind no claim could, by law, be made upon any man standing as a Candidate, for his share in the expence of what was called the hustings; and he had actually no concern whatever with the Election. Even his taking his seat in that House, was not a voluntary act, but a compulsory one, in obedience to the writ. He did not know of having been proposed as a Candidate, until nearly the termination of the poll. An action had been brought against him by the High Bailiff of Westminster, for payment of his share of the expence in erecting the hustings; and the plea was, that those hustings had been used by his friends; a verdict had been given against him for that sum, and he was surprised that a Judge so enlightened as the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench should conceive it, as his Lordship did in his direction to the Jury, a benefit conferred on an individual to have a seat in that House. The Hon. Baronet said that the matter, with regard to himself, was a thing he treated with indifference, but as it might concern the Electors of Westminster, and the privileges of the House, it was a very material point. He therefore wished the advice of the House, whether he ought to comply with the verdict, in order that it might not be said that the privileges of Parliament had been silently compromised by him.

Mr. Perceval said, as the Hon. Baronet had made no motion, he did not think a case had been made out to induce the House to interfere. Had the Learned Judge alluded to given a misdirection to the Jury, the Hon. Baronet, or his Counsel, might have availed themselves of that, and moved for a new trial. In another way his Counsel might have tendered a Bill of Exceptions.

The Speaker observed, that the Hon. Baronet had done no more than his duty by stating the complaint to the House. At present, he could give no opinion, but he should advise the Hon. Baronet to wait for any practical consequences that might result from the verdict, and then the Hon. Baronet might come forwafd and complain of a breach of privilege.

IRISH PRIVY COUNCIL.

Mr. Barham rose to bring forward a motion respecting the appointment, or rather the rumoured appointment of a Learned Civilian (Dr. Duigenan) as a Member of the Privy Council of Ireland. After some very pointed observations on the pertinacity of Ministers, in persisting in this appointment, which was odious to the Irish people, and improper in every light in which it could be viewed, he concluded by moving an Address to his Majesty for a Copy, or Copies of all Correspondence between the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Home Secretary of State, touching the appointment of Patrick Duigenan, Doctor of Laws, as a Member of his Majesty's Privy Council in Ireland.

Sir S. Wellesley said, that the Learned Doctor had not applied for the appointment (loud cries of hear! hear! from the Opposition.) That learned character filled an office as one of the Judges of the Prerogative Court in Ireland, and it was intended to bestow upon him a seat at the Privy Council Board. The Learned Doctor was warmly attached to the Protestant Government of Ireland, and he was well versed in clerical affairs. Upon matters of an ecclesiastical description alone would the Dortor be consulted.—(Laughter from the Opposition).

Sir R. Williams supported the motion, as did Lord Petty in a forcible speech. Mr. Curwen and Mr. W. Smith spoke also in support of the motion, and Mr. Windham likened Ministers to Lord Burleigh in The Critic, who shook his head and said nothing.

The House divided, when the Ayes for the motion were 104, Noes 174.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 12.

Lord Yarmouth, Chairman of the New Malton Election Committee, reported, that Bryan Cooke, Esq. the Sitting Member, had been duly elected.

The Hon. R. Ward presented a Petition from the Commissioners and Governors of Greenwich Hospital, praying for a division of Simon's Burn into two, or more livings.—Referred to a Committee.

Mr. Charles Yorke presented a Petition from the Farmers, Land-owners, Maltsters, and others, of the County of Cambridge, against the intended measure of permitting distillation from Sugar and Molasses. The Hon. Gentleman said, he should merely move, at present, that the Petition do lie on the table.—Ordered.

A Message from the Lords brought down the Scotch Judicature Bill, which was read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Wednesday next, and to be printed.

Mr. Wharton brought up a Bill imposing a duty of 2s. on every pound of corks, ready made, imported to Great Britain. Read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday next.

Mr. Trench brought up the Irish Felons Fees Bill, which was read a first time.

The Three Millions, and the One Million and an Half Exchequer Bills Bills, were read a third time each and passed.

Mr. Whitbread presented two Petitions from the Magistrates and Town Council of the Burgh of Ayr in Scotland: the former in favour of the Bill preventing the granting of Offices in Reversion; and the latter, against the Scotch Judicature Bill.—They were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Wharton brought up the Report of the Committee of Supply, granting an annual sum of 10,000*l.* to his Majesty, to enable the Sovereign to settle the same on his sister, the Duchess of Brunswick.—The Resolution was carried nem. con. and a Bill was ordered to be brought in accordingly.—The other Resolutions were agreed to.

Major Palmer moved, that the House do now resolve into a Committee to consider the report of a Select Committee on the Petition of John Palmer, Esq. of the City of Bath. The Speaker left the Chair.

Major Palmer then moved that the resolution in the report of the Committee be read, which was in effect, that Mr. J. Palmer was entitled to 1,500*l. per annum*, from the year 1793, and to 2½ per cent. on an increased revenue to the Post Office from that period, and during his natural life. This resolution having been read,

Mr. Long stated to the Committee, that the same subject had been agitated before the House nine years ago, and that the application for the compensation now recommended had been refused. The Hon. Gentleman in bringing the matter forward ought to have stated the facts attending it, which were, that the late Mr. Pitt contended, that Mr. Palmer had not fulfilled his engagement, and even had his claim been allowed, still that Government expected from Mr. Palmer the discharge of certain official duties in the Post Office. Indeed the charges against Mr. Palmer were, first, that he had caused a delay in the delivery of letters from the Post Office, in order to throw the blame of that delay on the Postmaster-General. Secondly, that he had suffered a person named Wilson to pass an exorbitant account for conveying the mails; and thirdly, that he had thrown the Inland Office into a state of confusion. Mr. Long contended that Mr. Palmer having accepted 3000*l.* a-year during his life in full, as a remuneration for his plan of conveying the mails in a more safe and speedy manner by coaches, was not entitled to 2½ per cent. on the revenue that had accumulated since, as the 3,000*l.* a-year during his life, was acknowledged by Mr. Palmer, in the presence of Mr. Pitt and himself (Mr. Long) to be fully sufficient.

Major Palmer contended that Mr. Palmer, sen. was entitled to the 2½ per cent. on the increase of the revenue which had accrued from the enhancement of the prices of postage of letters from the introduction of mail coaches, and that such had been the original stipulation with his father, but that it had ceased when he had been suspended from his duties in the Post Office. With regard to the charges against Mr. Palmer, the Major said, they were not well founded, neither could they be proved, for the Committee, years ago, before whom they were stated, sent the evidence to the House by their Chairman, without making any report upon it at all, and that such evidence ought not to have been received, as the Committee had been ordered to report the evidence, with their opinion and observations thereon, to the House.

Mr. Perceval contended, that the grant having been forfeited by Mr. P.'s misconduct, he had been treated more liberally than he deserved in receiving 3000*l.* for life.

After some debate, the Committee divided, when the question was carried in the affirmative, by 137 to 74.

On the question for receiving the Report to-morrow, a second division took place, when the Ayes were 26, and the Noes 31. The Report was therefore ordered to be received on Monday.

The Local Militia Bill was ordered to be taken into further consideration to-morrow.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 13.

General Gascoigne presented a petition from the inhabitants of Liverpool, in favour of the Sugar Distilleries.

The Interment Bill was read a third time and passed.

THE NEW ANNUITY PLAN.

The House resolved itself into a Committee for the purpose of enabling the holders of the Three per Cents. and South Sea Stocks, to purchase Annuities from Government.

Mr. Perceval said it was a subject of great importance, but he would at present abstain from pressing his opinion, he only wished the plan to pass through the Committee pro forma, so as to get it printed, to enable the House to judge of its general tendency. It would then be seen the intended plan would prove a radical benefit to the country, as it would enable persons who felt so disposed to transfer the Stock they held in the Three per Cents. and South Sea, for a fair and equitable annuity, taken at the market price, and to cease on the death of such annuitants. He proposed that the age should not exceed 35 years, and not less than 100*l.* stock should be admitted. He was well aware that the plan would enhance the price of stock, which was certainly an object in the present state of Europe; but it was in contemplation not to make any loan from the Three per Cents. and to reduce, if possible, the amount of it, as it frequently happened that there was too great a glut in the market during the war. In order to afford an inducement to those who wished to make such transfers, it was his intention to double the interest, which would be a great relief to many who had but a scanty income. Much benefit had already resulted from the progress of the Sinking Fund, as it had a visible effect in keeping up the funds. To instance the last loan, which was made at 62, now bore a premium of 6 per cent. and certainly if this plan had been brought forward last year, the public might have saved much by purchasing it at the then price. He did not mean to calculate to a nicety on the complete success of this measure, but if it produced any thing it would be beneficial in reducing the national debt, and give further extension to the Sinking Fund. He then concluded by moving the Resolution.

Mr. Windham said, at present he should only observe, that in regard to its morality, he thought it highly objectionable, as Annuities granted for such small sums of Stock would induce men of dissipated habits to alienate their small property from their families. When the measure was farther matured he should enter into its principles more fully.

Mr. Tierney cautioned the Minister against the institution of an open market for the prodigate to sink his money, to the utter ruin of his wife and family. He very much doubted if such a proposal, carried into effect, might not fairly be said to be an infraction of the Act of Parliament for the preservation of the Sinking Fund. He should suppose a case:—imagine a man possessed of 1000*l.* three per Cents, to receive as interest for that, at present, 30*l.* If he transferred it, as proposed, he would get for it 60*l.* The plan, he conceived, would be injurious to the Sinking Fund, and in violation of the Act under which it had been protected, and under which it had always been deemed sacred.

After several members had spoken Mr. Perceval replied, and concluded by moving that the Chairman do report progress and ask leave to sit again. The Chairman accordingly reported progress, and obtained leave for the Committee to sit again on Thursday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee on the Local Militia Bill, when several clauses were added and agreed to.

Mr. G. Vansittart moved an amendment, restricting the age of men liable to the ballot, from 18 to 30, instead of 35.

On this the Chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Monday.—Adjourned till Monday.

PROVINCIALS.

FOX CHACE.—A few days ago, two dogs, belonging to Mr. Marchin, of Ridley Hall, started a fox in the West Bank, near Judas Craigs, passed Jingho Haugh, in Hexhamshire, from thence to Blanchland, and, returning the same way back, proceeded to Beldon Shields, the distance about 40 miles, which was run from chace to view in three hours. The fox was taken under covert.

The Dottrel have not as yet appeared on the Wolds. They were never known so late. Swallows which generally appeared there between the 11th and 13th of April, did not make their appearance till May-day. The season of course is 16 or 17 days later.

EAGLES.—A short time since, at Moorside Parks, in the parish of Arkedon, (about five miles from Whitehaven) ten lambs, belonging to Mr. Dickinson, of that place, were killed by two eagles; and some others desperately wounded.

MURDERS.—A letter dated on Thursday last, at Drayton, Dorset, states, that a horrid murder was committed on the bodies of Mr. and Mrs. Sledger, of Thaw Farm, two miles from Drayton, on Wednesday morning, at two o'clock. Three robbers broke into the house and alarmed the family, and the farmer and his wife were bound together in bed. There was only a maid-servant, of the name of Sarah Cullum in the house, and she fled at the alarm, at four o'clock in the morning. Two hours after the servant had escaped, she procured assistance, when the poor old man and woman were found dead, and mangled in a shocking manner. Their ages amounted to 150 years, they were unable to make resistance, and the house had been completely plundered. One of the villains worked on the farm, according to the information of the servant, and he has decamped.

SHOCKING CRUELTY.—A poor boy, named John Knight, had been bound out as an apprentice from the house of industry, at Melton, in Suffolk. On the 9th of January last, his master's head man, named John Hafelden, took him, while very ill and unable to work, naked out of his bed, put him into a hog-cistern, and unmercifully beat him with a horse-whip and the root of a tree, and afterwards kicked him. For this brutal assault, Hafelden was tried at the late Woodbridge Quarter Sessions, and sentenced to one year's imprisonment. The wretch pleaded guilty, to prevent the evidence from being given; but the Magistrates heard the whole case, in order to fix the punishment.

TUESDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

Admiralty-Office, May 10.

Extract of a Letter from Capt. Palmer, of the Pheasant sloop, to the Hon. W. W. Pole, dated at Spithead, the 8th inst.

SATURDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

The Gazette contains an Order from his Majesty in Council, that all Portuguese property now detained, and not already decreed to be restored, nor entitled to restitution under his Majesty's order of the 6th of January, shall be forthwith restored, upon claim being made by the Portuguese Minister, Consul, or other person not resident in Portugal, or in any other place subject to the control of France.

Permission is also granted to British subjects to trade with the Islands of St. Thomas, St. John, and St. Croix.

A Proclamation for pardoning such seamen and marines as have deserted, and shall return into his Majesty's service on or before the 31st of December next, is also inserted.

The Gazette likewise contains a letter from Captain Selby, of his Majesty's ship Cerberus, in company with the Lily, Pelican, Swinger, and Mosambique, giving an account of his having captured, on the 30th of March, the Island of Deseada, in the West Indies:—

Captain Sheriff, of his Majesty's sloop Lily, with a detachment of seamen and marines from each vessel, under their respective commanders, (who gallantly voluntered their services on the occasion) stood towards the shore, which was defended by a battery of two nine-pounders, completely commanding the narrow entrance of the harbour; together with the national troops and militia, amounting to about seventy men, who opened their fire upon the boats, when it was found necessary to anchor the squadron with springs on their cables, and commence a cannonading, which soon silenced them, and at four o'clock the French flag was struck; the boats landed at half past four, hoisted the British flag, and the whole island surrendered without opposition; and the capture was effected without further loss.

There are letters from Captain Symonds, of his Majesty's sloop Tweed, reporting the capture of a Spanish letter of marque, of 14 guns, and 20 men, and the privateer L'Aventure, of 3 guns, and 30 men. Also a letter from Lieutenant Rorie, of his Majesty's brig Fortunee, giving an account of his having captured a Spanish feluca letter of marque, of 1 long 12-pounder, and 15 men; and a letter from Captain Searle, of his Majesty's sloop Grasshopper, containing the particulars of his having taken two Spanish gun-boats, destroyed two others, and captured two valuable Spanish ships, worth 90,000*l.* each; which was not effected without the loss of one man killed, and three wounded—the enemy had 40 killed, and 14 wounded: and a letter from Captain Dashwood, of his Majesty's ship Franchise, giving advice of his having captured the French privateer, Le Hazard, of 4 guns, and 50 men.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

SPAIN—AND REPORTS OF HER TREATY WITH FRANCE.

In another part of our Paper we have inserted the most important of the articles that relate to the Revolution in Spain. It appears that the father and son, the King of Spain and the Prince of Asturias, as well as the Prince of the Peace, are met at Bayonne, to receive the sentence of Bonaparte. The son has never yet been acknowledged in the French Papers by any other title than that of Prince of the Asturias. Perhaps this circumstance ought to be construed favourably for the old King—perhaps it is only a trick for the purpose of making a better bargain with the young Prince. In the meantime it appears, that the Spanish people begin to resent the puppet-like contempt with which they have been treated. An eminent Spanish wool-house, in Bristol, has made public the following circumstances:—

BRISTOL, MAY 12.—"At Madrid 4000 of the French garrison had been disarmed by the mob, the artillery spiked, &c. in which affair the women had played a most conspicuous part. There were constant deputations from the provinces, offering men to assist Government—Catalonia and Arragon had offered 150,000 men. In Biscay the whole of the country had risen en masse, and, in short, every where the people appeared determined to scout French influence. They seemed vexed that the young Prince had passed the frontier, who would, of course, be detained by Bonaparte, but that would make no alteration in their intentions, &c. These particulars were received by a Spaniard, who depends on his intelligence. Another house has also a letter to the same purport, and the opinion of the best-informed is, that by this time torrents of blood have been spilt, but that the nation will ultimately prevail, and that the insurrection will extend to Portugal. The vessel which brought this intelligence sailed from Bilboa only 15 days since."

A report prevailed yesterday afternoon, that a treaty has actually been signed at Bayonne, between Bonaparte and the new King of Spain. It is said, that the substance of the principal articles is as follows:—

By the first article Bonaparte recognizes the new King of Spain Ferdinand the VIIth.

By the second he confers upon Ferdinand the Administration of Portugal till a general peace.

Another article relates to the Prince of the Peace, who has not, it seems, been released, but will be sent into France. This article contains an accusation against him.

Another article declares that Spain is to furnish a contingent of 50,000 men to the Confederation of the Rhine.

By another article a port in Spanish America is ceded to France.

And it is added, that there are other articles of a secret nature.

We beg to be understood as stating these circumstances merely in the shape of reports, for the truth of which we do not pretend to vouch.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, on Friday night, proposed in the House of Commons, a plan for converting three per cents. consols. and reduced, into life annuities, according to an equitably estimated scale of purchase.—These annuities are to be paid out of the sinking fund, which will thus be made to redeem at the present price of the funds all sums converted into annuities, whereas these sums, if they should remain in the funds, must be redeemable by Government only at a much higher price, because the operation of the sinking fund and the restoration of peace, seem likely to create a constant increase in the value of stocks. Perhaps the advantages of this plan will not be very extensive, because any body who has a mind to employ his money in buying annuities, may buy them at present on good security: but every relief is to be approved, however partial, and we think the sinking fund is well employed in such a scheme. The only persons likely to suffer materially, are the proprietors of the insurance offices, who will find, but in very few cases, an inclination on the part of the public for prefering the security of their offices to that of Government.

There seems to be no longer any doubt, from the intelligence brought by some British ships, that the Rochefort Squadron has returned from its cruize to Toulon. The French Papers announce, that Gantheaume entered Toulon on the evening of the 10th.

Bonaparte has laid an embargo upon all American vessels in the French ports: a measure which is stated to have been in conformity with the Bayonne Decree. We understand that pains have been taken in the drawing up of the Decree, to make it appear a proceeding less hostile to America than was at first conceived. However, there is something ridiculous in the pretence that this act is to be esteemed a measure of kind consideration towards America: but Bonaparte says, that the precaution is necessary for preventing her property from being seized by the British, who would certainly way-lay them on the high seas.

General Klingspor, by a report dated 11th April, gives intelligence of a skirmish between his troops and the enemy in Finland, which was attended with no remarkable result. In a second report, dated the 20th, he relates a slight action, which terminated in the retreat of the enemy.

It was supposed at Gottenburgh, that the Swedish army in Finland had suffered severely in an action near Brahnstadt. In Norway, General Armfeldt had driven the enemy across the Glomme, and was pursuing his advantages. An engagement took place, on the 26th of April, in sight of Stromstadt, among twenty-eight Norway coasting vessels, four Swedish gun-boats, and one mortar boat: the following is the Gottenburgh account of the action:—

"At half-past five o'clock the Norway flotilla appeared, mounting guns from 6 to 24-pounders. Four of our gun-boats, and one mortar, towed to meet them, about half way, half a gun-shot from the town. The engagement was begun by our gun-boats, and continued under an incessant shower of balls, for the space of one hour and forty minutes. It terminated so that our boats gave the last fire. In the presence of the spectators, two of the enemy's vessels were sunk, with their crews and every thing on board; three of them they towed away, and one was missing, which doubtless has been sunk. On our side there were four killed, and two men so much wounded that they died shortly after; seven were slightly wounded."

In the Foreign News we have given the principle articles of the last Gottenburgh Mails, which relate to the Russian invasian of Gothland.

Dutch Papers to the 10th inst. arrived yesterday afternoon. A letter from Milan, dated April 25, is inserted, which says, it is now confirmed that Admiral Gantheaume left part of his fleet behind him at Corfu. General Dubreuil, who has arrived from that Island, on board the brigantine Friedland, states, that there has been left the Uranie frigate, of 44 guns, two corvettes of 32 guns each, six brigs, and two galliots. And also accounts from Helsingfors, dated March 23, which state, that a division of the Russian army is advancing to Wasa, on the gulph of Bothnia. It is supposed the Swedes will be cut off by this division.—The retreat of the Swedes is so rapid, that they have not even time to spike their cannon, far less carry them off.

Another Expedition.—Report is afloat in military circles, that a Grand Expedition will soon start, to consist of 20,000 men. Sir Arthur Wellesley or General Beresford to command it; with a brevet rank.

Among the corps the following are to go:—2d, or Queen's Regiment; 3d, or Buffs; 5th, 28th, or Cameronians; 40th, 45th, 71st, 88th, and 95th. Some Cavalry go in this expedition, and a very large Staff.

The Expedition under General Prevost arrived at Halifax on the 7th of March.

It appears from the return of the number of men wanting to complete the Volunteers in Great Britain up to their original establishment, that the deficiency altogether is 58,655.

An order has been issued to increase the number of the Royal Marines serving in the Navy, as follows:—25 to a ship of the first rate, 20 to a second rate, 15 to a third rate, 10 to a fourth rate and large frigates, and in proportion to smaller ships.

Accounts from Oporto reached town on Friday. They are dated up to the 3d inst. It appears that the famine in Portugal is not so severe as the English have been led to conceive it. It also appears, that the French allow shipments of wine to be made, under certain regulations. One of the principal is, that the merchant, or shipper, is to pay an additional duty upon wine, at the rate of 36s. per puncheon.

Tuscany is now divided into three Departments; namely, Florence, Siena, and Leghorn; which are subdivided into several Prefectures. The Privy Council is abolished, with all other Public Boards of the former Government, so that no traces are left of the antient form.

A Mail from Tortola arrived on Thursday night in twenty-eight days. We are sorry to find, that Port d'Espagne, in the Island of Trinidad, has been consumed by fire. The cause of this dreadful disaster has not transpired. The Mail left the islands all well.

The Catholics of Switzerland and the Pope are at this moment at variance. The small Council of Lucerne have addressed a Memorial to his Holiness, to permit the abolition of monasteries within their territory.

A Commercial Treaty between Bavaria and Italy has been agreed upon, but not ratified. While the present obstructions in the way of navigation continue, this treaty will be of great importance to the whole of Italy, Germany, &c.

The late Admiral Rainier has left property to the amount of nearly 250,000*l.*; and after providing amply for his near relations, he made the following bequest:—

"I bequeath one-tenth part of my personal property to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being, towards the reduction of the National Debt, in acknowledgment of the generous bounty of the national establishment of the Royal Navy, in which I have acquired the principal part of the fortune I now have, which has exceeded my merit and pretensions."

Letters from Irun, dated the 25th of April assert, that, through the interference of France, the Prince of the Peace has been set at liberty. It is added, that the unfortunate Prince, when taken out of his prison, was without a shirt, and had a beard several inches long.

The Court of Sweden went into mourning on the 26th ult. for six weeks, for the late King of Denmark, Christian VII. who was uncle to the King of Sweden.

The Queen of Holland has been safely delivered of a son, on which occasion great public rejoicings took place.

The serious spectacle now exhibiting at that elegant Theatre in Catherine-street, equals any performances of the summer amusements. The story is taken from that celebrated poet Valerius Flacus, and the manner in which it is got up does credit to the Managers.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

HIS MAJESTY'S LEVEE.

Wednesday the King held a Private Levee at the Queen's Palace, when the following were presented upon their promotion:

Admiral Nugent.

Rear-Admirals—Mark Robinson and G. Losack.

Generals—Sir J. Pulteney, Campbell, Gwynne, Lord Heathfield, and Stanwix.

Lieutenant-Generals—Thornton, Phipps, Benson, Finch, Sir A. Wellesley, and Brownrigg.

Major General the Hon. Alexander Hope.

Colonel Brown, of the 12th Light Dragoons.

Captains—W. Losack and Cramer.

His Majesty held a Privy Council, and gave audiences to the Duke of Portland, and the other Cabinet Ministers.

HER MAJESTY'S DRAWING ROOM.

On Thursday her Majesty held a Drawing Room at St. James's Palace, which was most numerously attended.—The following were among the numerous presentations:

Earl of Mayo, Miss Barrell, Earl of O'Neil, Lady Augusta Greville, Sir Thomas and Lady Ackland, Earl and Countess of Scarborough, Colonel and Mrs. Dorien, Lady C. Strangeways, Lord Lowther, Sir John Bailey, Capt. Peter Rainier, Major Ximenes, Lady Andover, Capt. Digby, Lord and Lady Selsea, Earl and Countess of Shannon, Miss Curzon, Mr. Pinckney, Mr. Greville Howard and Miss Howard, Earl and Countess of Craven, George Rose, jun. Mr. and the Hon. Mrs. Cockerel, Marquis of Tweedale, Sir John and Lady Shelly, Mr. and Mrs. March Phillips, Miss Magens, Marquis of Huntly, Lord and Lady Henry Petty, Miss Murray, Ladies Lowthers, General and Mr. Campbell, Lady Louisa Vane, Viscount Falmouth, Miss Elizabeth Burgoyne, Lieut.-Col. Stevenson Barns, Hon. Miss St. John, Countess of Ormond, Miss Harvey, the Hon. Charles Townshend, and Miss Needham.

The same officers were presented upon their promotion as were at the Levee on the preceding day.

The Countess of Craven's appearance at Court on Thursday, excited much curiosity. She went in a new chair, attended by two footmen in new white liveries. Her Majesty received her in the most condescending manner. The whole of the Noble Earl's relatives were present upon the occasion.

CITY.

Monday a Court of Common Council was held at Guildhall, when a Report was presented from the Committee of City Lands, in relation to Smithfield Market, upon which it was moved that the Court do approve thereof, and that they be directed to expedite the passing of the Bill in Parliament for the carrying the same into execution, which caused a long debate.—The motion was carried with an understanding that the Committee would not proceed therein without reporting to the Court.

A Report was received from the General Purpose Committee, in relation to the Bill before Parliament, for extending the powers of the Court of Requests to 10*l*. Finding that the Law Lords were not favourable to it, they had recommended it to the Court to withdraw the Bill for the present Session, till a conference could be had with them, and their objections removed. The Court thought it advisable to wait till next Session, when there might be a probability of the Bill receiving the concurrence of the Judges.

The Lord Mayor laid before the Court, the Bill for establishing a Local Militia, which, though it did not affect the City, he thought it advisable to refer it to a Committee, to watch the progress of it, which was done accordingly.—Adjourned.

The Lord Mayor on Tuesday ordered the price of bread to be raised half an assize, or a penny in the peck loaf.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when Captain Collins, of the Travers, took leave previous to departing for Madeira, Madras, and Bengal. A. Cunningham, Esq. was appointed the Company's Agent at the Brazils. The Court adjourned at six o'clock till Wednesday next.

The outward-bound East India fleet, under convoy of the Leopard, were off Falmouth on the 11th instant, with a fair wind.

THE DRAMATIC DETECTOR.
No. V.

A Theatre should be open to all, influenced by none.

If the complaint which Horace brings against his own contemporaries for attempting to trade as authors without having served an apprenticeship, was general in the age of Augustus, when printing had not yet begun to facilitate the diffusion of dulness, what must be the lamentation of a Critic in our days, who not only finds a press teeming with the absurdities of would-be poets, but also sees two great and classical Theatres bestowing their patronage and opening their stores to a set of authors unworthy of any place more noble than a butter-shop? We know that it is impossible for any power to prevent bad authors from writing; but it is not impossible for any power to prevent bad plays from appearing on the Stage.

We are not among the number of those who conceive that no dramatic genius, except in the instances of Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Cumberland, exists in the present day. We acknowledge ourselves to have admired Mr. Colman, and laughed with Mr. Reynolds; we have been interested by Mr. Morton, and pleased by Mr. Kenney. But if we possess good authors, it is the more disgraceful that those who are bad should so often be obtruded upon the town.

It has been found in all ages, that genius has become abundant in proportion to the encouragement bestowed upon it. It is absurd to imagine that human nature, from century to century, materially varies in point of native ability: the difference that we behold arises from circumstances, not from nature. If in the time of Augustus there arose an unprecedented number of great writers, was it because human genius was improved? No; it was because the exertion of genius led to reward. Did the soul of mankind go to sleep from the close of that period to the Popedom of Leo the Tenth? No; but Leo the Tenth promised patronage to genius, and genius came forward to claim that patronage. Were the intellects of all Europe paralysed from that time till the reign of Louis the Fourteenth? No: it became the fashion for the great to encourage genius, and genius immediately began to flourish. The philosophy of the vulgar, indeed, declares that De non apparentibus et non existentibus, eadem est ratio; but a reasoning mind goes a little deeper than the surface, and acknowledges it to be possible that a mine may exist, although no gold-dust glitter over the ground.

If these positions be true, (and they seem undeniable), the quantity of dramatic genius might probably be much increased in this country by due encouragement. And the persons who must give this encouragement are not Emperors, Popes, nor Princes: but the Managers of the two winter theatres. For a long time past it has been almost impossible for any man, not possessing a very powerful interest, to procure the representation of any piece in either play-house: and of course it is not to be expected that authors of real genius will waste their time in writing plays. Suppose an author has sent a play to Drury Lane, if his name be unknown, it is likely that the production will never be read: which is a very encouraging prospect.—But even that is not the worst; for when he applies to recover his copy, he very probably has the mortification of hearing, not only that his play is not to be acted, but that it has unfortunately been mislaid, and that the Managers have no hope of finding it. At Covent Garden the case is somewhat less annoying to the anonymous author: for though his piece is pretty sure not to be read, or if read, to be rejected, yet he may, perhaps, get his copy again in a month or six weeks, and publish his play, if he can persuade any bookseller to buy what the theatres have refused. Let us now suppose that an author who has some private acquaintance with one of the Managers of Drury Lane, sends his piece to that house. Perhaps Mr. Graham, the reading Manager, likes it, and wishes to have it put in rehearsal; but perhaps Mr. Wroughton, the acting Manager, does not choose to strengthen Mr. Graham's power in the theatre, and impedes the progress of the affair. If the play be originally presented to Mr. Wroughton, Mr. Graham may feel the same sort of jealousy, and thus equally the author suffers. However, it is said, that Mr. T. Sheridan is in future to have the authority of the theatre, in the acceptance or rejection of dramatic works, and then, perhaps, less inconvenience will result to the public. For Mr. T. Sheridan, as far as we have been able to collect, is a gentleman of natural parts and great acquirements, an able critic, and a good-natured man. Under such a director, we may hope to see the theatre better conducted; and we shall be most happy, if we find that a panegyric, which we have given from general opinion, is established by the evidence of fact.

But while we throw some portion of blame on the Managers who have hitherto conducted the concerns of Drury Lane, we cannot but admit that their system has been infinitely more liberal than that pursued at Covent Garden. Mr. Graham and Mr. Wroughton, though sometimes misled into a neglect of their managerial duties have not flown boldly in the face of all justice. Mr. Graham and Mr. Wroughton have given encouragement to new authors, and the stage has been benefitted by their candour: Miss Chambers, the authoress of The School for Friends, Mr. H. Siddons, the author of Time's a Tell-tale, and several other successful dramatists, have made their first appearance within these two or three years on the boards of Drury Lane: to say nothing of a great number of other authors who, though they reflect no fame upon the judgment, yet certainly prove the candour of the Managers. Without speaking favourably in a critical point of view of The Soldier's Daughter, and The Travellers, The Hero of the North, Tekeli, The Sleeping Beauty, Cinderella, The Forty Thieves, Kais, &c. &c. &c. it may be fairly said that all these pieces were acted with success, and were received by the Managers although their authors were all completely new to the stage. Several other fresh authors have within these few years obtained a representation for their pieces: but as these pieces did not please the public, it would not be fair to recapitulate them. Now what instances of new authors, encouraged within the same period, can Covent Garden produce to balance the foregoing list? Our memory at present furnishes us with only one example, which is that of Mr. Kenney, whose farce of Raising the Wind originally appeared at Covent Garden—unless, indeed, Capt. Hewitson can be called an author, who brought to the Proprietors the French piece from which The Blind Boy was ingeniously hashed by the professed cooks of the Theatre. The system of Mr. Harris, (we say of Mr. Harris because we understand that Mr. Kemble, by the articles of his agreement is totally unconnected with the reading of new plays) the system of Mr. Harris appears to be a system of favouritism. There are certain persons about him, who flatter all his prejudices and tickle all his piques, who ridicule good sense out of sight whenever it ventures to approach him, who thus procure for themselves and their friends a monopoly of theatrical composition, and like the Junto that in a higher theatre work malignantly and darkly against the political good, are injuring his concern under a pretence of personal friendship to himself. Any nonsense that is manufactured by this set, is received by the easy Proprietor: pieces presented by authors who can describe nature in good English are generally thrust away with contempt, or if received at first, are treated with so much coldness and besieged by so many obstacles, that their production becomes almost impracticable. There are indeed some authors of established greatness who now and then send pieces to Covent Garden, and whose rank in the literary world compels the proprietors to attend to their claims: but he, who cannot demand his admission by his fame, will never obtain it by his talent; and though the works of Mr. Colman, and one or two other authors of the first rate reputation, have still a chance of appearing on the boards of Covent Garden, yet, if the School for Scandal itself could be sent to-morrow, a virgin manuscript, to the stage door in Hart-street, unrecommended by the junto, it is our firm belief that it would be returned to the author. The Honey-Moon, it is well known, was rejected at Covent Garden: yes, at the same theatre where Two Faces under a Hood was backed by the Music of Mr. Shield; and the Ogre and Little Thumb supported with all the splendour of the mineral and elemental worlds!

It might be supposed that actors had some sort of influence in bringing forward pieces: that an author could not do better than to take a new play to the performer for whom he intended the principal part, and request him to procure a representation. On the contrary; the proposition of an actor would tend to injure the piece; for the proprietors of theatres are particularly jealous of their actors, whom they wish to keep down by a most absolute despotism: and to allow to any actor the consequence which he must gain from the performance of a play recommended or written by himself, would be very, very, dangerous to the unqualified supremacy of the executive power.

Under all these circumstances, let it no longer be pleaded in theatrical circles, that the scarcity of genius is the reason why so many wretched things are exhibited: the fact is, that the exhibition of these wretched things is the reason why genius seems scarce. Can plants be expected to shoot through the earth when a weight of rubbish is strown along the surface of the soil? Can authors of real genius be expected to arise, when they know that they must instantly be crushed by the potent, though secret, influence of bad taste, of prejudice, and of party?

So much for the conduct of managers toward authors. We have advanced nothing as fact for which we have not good authority. We do not hope to amend the managers, but we have, at least, given some information to the public. Indeed a system that requires alteration is seldom set to rights by warning: it goes on accumulating errors, and rising in malversation, till at last some violent abuse makes the pile top-heavy, and it sinks beneath its own unwieldiness.

FINE ARTS.

EXHIBITION AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

120. Card Players.—D. WILKIE.

In this picture four men are represented playing at cards. The figure on the left exultingly points out to his partner the trick which they are just gaining: and that partner is employed in showing to a gazer, who leans over his chair, the triumphant game that he has in his hand. The card player whose front face is exposed to the spectator expresses his mortification with coolness, while the gambler who is visible only in the back front, scratches his head with every symptom of disappointment and displeasure. Near the table stands a woman, probably the landlord's wife, with a child in her arms, stretching out its little hands to grasp the painted cards. The child's countenance is expressive of great eagerness: that of the woman appears too placid to leave room for an idea that she can be the wife of any one of the gamblers. In the left of the picture there is a dog asleep. The walls, the table, the window, the chimney-piece, are covered with those numberless little utensils, which give such an air of reality to the pictures of this young artist. The expression of all these figures is well imagined as to each, and well contrasted as to the reference of the individual and the neighbour. The delineation of the inanimate objects is for the most part minutely accurate, and the whole piece appears to be as highly finished as the size of the picture will permit. There is, perhaps, but one fault in the work, which is the uncouthness of the habits, we can hardly say the drapery. The coats of the men, a bag on the chimney-piece, a blue mantle on the left side of the wall, a grey hood on the right, look like painted pasteboard. They have all the edge and all the stiffness, and all the glaze of that useful article of stationary. The varnish has given too much glare to the whole picture; but the defect of the appendage shall not be urged by us as impeachment of the work itself; a fine figure does not become crooked, even though its cloathes sit awkwardly upon it.

But while we are happy to pay our tribute of praise to Mr. Wilkie's talent, we will not, like our cotemporary critics, go so far as to dignify that talent with the name of genius. Talents of a thousand various kinds may exist, which entitle their possessor to the credit of cleverness, ingenuity, grace, science, and other qualities highly valuable; but when we hear the word genius applied to the delineation of ragged jackets and tin candlesticks, we cannot but reject the profanation, and deny the existence of the vast merit imputed. The figures of Mr. Wilkie certainly have expression, but it is the lowest kind of expression; and though the painter of a sorrowing Magdalene, or of suffering Christ, might deserve the praise of sublimity, and the title of genius, for the expression of his picture; yet an artist will hardly gain the reputation of genius with posterity for the expression that he throws into a cobler's lip, or the coarse fat of which he constitutes a landlady's cheeks. It is sublimity that deserves the title of genius: it is that creative, majestic awful power, which produces effects upon the mind by the combined greatness of the whole, and not that laborious, detailed, accurate copyism which amuses the eye by the separate exactness of the parts. The talents of Mr. Wilkie is certainly of a higher order than that of the Dutch painters in general; for they seem usually to have taken but little heed to the expression of face, although they bestowed infinite pains upon the dirty paraphernalia of the apartments. But Mr. Wilkie's style, when it is taken with all possible advantages, is not to be extolled with such panegyric as we now hear bestowed upon it; it is little better then the expression of that, which, when it has been expressed, appears not to have been worth expressing. We shall always call him a clever painter, but while he paints in this way alone, we shall never call him a man of genius. The word is become too common; it is profanely used on every occasion.

95. Portrait of the Right Hon. William Pitt.—A posthumous Picture.—J. LAWRENCE, R. A.

The picture is exceedingly like that which was painted of Mr. Pitt by Mr. Hoppner. Mr. Lawrence, however, as we understand, denies that he has improved any thing from the previous work of that great artist. The likeness here is very striking. The figure stands at a table on which the left hand rests; and those who remember Mr. Pitt will have great pleasure in looking at a portrait which conveys so accurate an idea of his attitude, countenance, and manner. Some persons have complained of a feverish appearance in the face; but we own that to us the picture appears to be exceedingly well-coloured, and in no instance to

"O'erstep the modesty of nature."

We understand that Mr. Lawrence calls this a posthumous picture, because he painted it from the dead body of Mr. Pitt. But surely this does not make the picture posthumous. A posthumous poem is a poem published after the poet's death; and the proper meaning of the words "a posthumous picture," seems to be a picture exhibited after the death of the painter. According to Mr. Lawrence's vocabulary, every ancient history may be called a posthumous work, since it is published after the death of the persons who constitute its subject.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

PLYMOUTH, MAY 10.—The Cheerly gun-brig, which arrived here yesterday, brought dispatches from Admiral Sir C. Cotton's fleet off the Tagus, which she left all well, twelve days since. She brings intelligence of an exploit performed by the boats of the Nymph frigate, and Blossom sloop of war, four of which from each of those ships, manned and armed, proceeded up the Tagus, about three weeks since, under cover of the night, in order to attack a large Portuguese brig, mounting 20 guns, manned with a French crew, which lay moored above Belem Castle, and immediately off the city of Lisbon; the boats got very near her before they were discovered, when a tremendous fire was opened upon them from the ship, and from several thousand troops which lined the shore. Captain Shipley, the Commander of the Nymph, headed the expedition, and got first alongside the enemy, and was the first who attempted to board, which he had nearly effected, when he was unfortunately shot by a musket-ball, and immediately fell overboard, and was seen no more! This calamitous circumstance so damped the spirits of the boat's crews, and finding themselves opposed by such an immense force, the enterprize was forthwith abandoned, and the boats returned down the harbour with the loss of their brave Commander, one seaman killed, and a midshipman and three seamen wounded. Captain Shipley is represented a most brave and gallant Officer, about 26 years of age.

PLYMOUTH, MAY 11.—An Officer arrived this morning in a packet from Sicily, six days from Gibraltar. He says, the French and Spanish fleet, including the Rochefort squadron, has certainly relieved Corfu; and, on its return, Lord Collingwood's squadron was just in time to perceive it go into Toulon. There is reason to think, that one of our frigates is taken by the French and Spanish fleet, as a frigate was sent out from Malta to Gibraltar, to give notice of the French squadrons being in the Mediterranean, and having joined the Spanish squadron, has not since been heard of. This Officer has been but a month from Sicily, and the packet he came in has been attacked three times by privateers, on her passage home. The Rochefort squadron, it appears, meant to have landed their troops in Sicily, but did not, from an idea that our reinforcements had arrived; but this not being the case, the French have lost the opportunity. At Gibraltar, it is said, that Bonaparte has sworn to take that fortress, and his people have been at Algesiras to reconnoitre it. He will find it, however, a tough job, for the improvements are beyond all conception.

BOXING.

On Tuesday the match between Gully and Gregson, Horton and Crib, and Dutch Sam and Cropley, took place in Sir J. Seabright's Park, near Market-street, Herts, after it had been prevented at three other places. It was nearly three o'clock, when a ring was formed, by permission, in Sir John's Park—and the first exhibition took place between Crib and Horton, amidst a tremendous fall of rain. A ring was next formed for Gulley and Gregson. They set to at half past three o'clock, with their seconds, Joe Ward and Gibbons for Gulley, and Lee and Richman for Gregson. Betting five to four on Gully.

The rounds continued in favour of Gully till the 17th, when Gregson lost his temper, and run in upon his adversary, who kept hitting and getting away from him in a manner which excited astonishment. He turned his back to his man twice in the round, and made towards the ropes; but Gully changed his front, fibbed him, and kept him from falling until he had ruffianed him into an apparently senseless state, and then dropped him quietly between his arms.

Eleven other rounds were fought, and Gregson was constantly receiving tremendous blows on the head and loins; he was fighting under every disadvantage of weakness, blindness, &c. and consequently unable to turn the career of his adversary. In the 25th round he received two tremendous blows, which decided it in the 28th, when Gregson could not be brought to the mark of setting to in time; he also received a severe hit in the ear in the 27th round.

Gully fought with studied caution; and when he had his antagonist at rallying, there was not one instance where Gully failed. The champion was also in much better condition than when he fought at Newmarket, and never betrayed symptoms of weakness.

After the battle Gully addressed the ring, and informed them publicly, he was so situated that he never intended to fight again, nor would he have done so in this instance, had he not been bound in honour to comply with Gregson's challenge. He had in this instance fought with a lame arm, and Gregson surely would not desire to combat with him again. The battle lasted one hour and a quarter.

CRIB AND HORTON.

This contest lasted the same time as the former, but bettings were six to four at setting to, and they gradually rose to the end of the fight. It was not a good match, and Crib beat his adversary without receiving much injury.

DUTCH SAM AND CROPLEY.

This was a real scientific combat of thirty-five minutes, and was won by Dutch Sam tolerably easy. Our limits will not admit of our entering into particulars.

The fighting was not over until seven o'clock in the evening.

FIRES.

Tuesday morning, about four o'clock, a fire was discovered in the back warehouses of Mr. Scott, linen-draper, in Smithfield, which soon communicated to St. Bartholomew's church adjoining. Fortunately, by the activity of a fireman, who cut away a partition, the flames were prevented from extending to that part of Mr. Scott's house, were his books, &c. were deposited; in doing which, some of the ruins fell and injured him so much that he was conveyed to St. Bartholomew's Hospital. By the great exertions of a considerable number of bluecoat boys, in supplying the engines with water, which they had to fetch from a considerable distance, the church was preserved, with only the destruction of the vestry, out of which the registers were rescued by the intrepidity of the watchman of the Hospital.

On Wednesday morning, between three and four o'clock, a fire broke out in the yard of Mr. Coates, a coach-builder, in Blackfriars-road. Several new and old carriages, the work-shops, &c. as also several tenements, were destroyed. The fire was occasioned, it was said, by the carelessness of a hackney coachman, in leaving a light in his carriage after putting it up, at a late hour on Tuesday evening. It is impossible to describe the distress of the people living at the back of the premises—they were running about naked, almost frantic, while others were busily employed in removing their furniture, &c. In the confusion, a Jew, of the name of Solomon, who had put his purse into his pocket, was robbed of it, which contained a considerable sum.

Same morning, at half past six o'clock, a fire broke out at a pawnbroker's, in Portpool-lane, Gray's Inn-lane.

A dreadful fire broke out, on Wednesday last, in the warehouse of Messrs. Fector and Co. at Dover, which it is said destroyed property to the amount of 30,000*l.*

MARRIED.

At Surinam, in October last, Charles Frederici, Esq. son to J. F. Frederici, Esq. late Governor of that Colony, to Miss Van Ommaron, of the same Colony, an agreeable young lady, with a large fortune.

At Hayes, Major Pilkington, to Miss Gibbs, only daughter of the Attorney-General.

DIED.

Tuesday, at Whitehall, after a lingering illness, the Hon. Anne Smith, daughter of Lord Carrington.

At the Deanery, Bocking, the Right Hon. and Rev. Lord C. Aynsley, only brother of his Grace the Duke of Athol.

At Thornham, Mr. S. Jones. He was remarkable for his penurious economy. From the situation of a Gentleman's coachman, he rose to the possession of a fortune, and accumulated the sum of 27,000*l.* by denying himself the enjoyments of life. He has bequeathed his property to a number of poor relations, to whom, during his life, he paid no attention. A niece, with a large family, to whom he left 8000*l.* died at Maidstone, on Wednesday se'nnight.

LONDON MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.

FRIDAY, MAY 13.—Since Monday we have scarcely had any fresh supplies of grain. Wheat remains dull, but no alteration in prices. Barley and Beans are scarce, and the latter article rather higher. Having very few Oats for sale, more money is again asked, but the sales are so few that the prices may be considered nominal.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER TWENTY-ONE.

ON BONAPARTE'S PROJECTED INVASION OF INDIA.

On Wednesday last a letter from the Continent was received in London, containing the following information:

"You will be surprised to hear, that the Porte has resolved, "after all, to declare itself in favour of England. The Turkish "Government, after having been threatened and cajoled by "turns by the French Minister, in order to induce it to join "France and her Allies, to which it was by no means indis-"posed, has been at length driven to adopt an opposite resolu-"tion, from the extent of the demands made upon it."

We announced some time ago the determination of Bonaparte respecting an attempt at the Invasion of India: and we inserted, from Foreign Papers, some statements, declaring, that the Porte had actually granted permission for the passage of troops through its territory. It was understood that this concession on the part of the Grand Signior was made in return for the French Emperor's mediation, by which the differences were accommodated between Turkey and Russia. Austria and France have been advancing toward the Turkish territories, perhaps in order to take an early advantage of any favourable disposition in the Grand Signior, and perhaps to overawe him into a compliance in case of an unwillingness. At the same time Russia seems not to have been backward in contributing her aid toward the projected Invasion.

The physical obstacles to an Invasion of India are so vast, that to an ordinary mind they would seem almost insurmountable. But Bonaparte, like the Arabian Hero, seems to possess the talismanic sword, that being struck on Adamantine gates, bids their thousand bolts fly backward, and when lifted against whole armies, annihilates them in a moment. That which would have been perhaps impracticable to unaided France, became a matter by no means hopeless for France united with Austria and Russia. No intervening nation could stop the progress of the Indian Expedition, when Russia had been once subdued: Russia now is subdued, and if the intention of Bonaparte be real, if the plan of Invasion be not one of those splendid bubbles that the Emperor of the French finds it necessary now and then to launch for the amusement and occupation of his soldiery, we cannot suppose that the Porte will be able to do much toward the prevention of an army's progress, or overturn one tittle of Bonaparte's magnificent designs.

But though it may be impossible for Turkey to overturn the designs of Bonaparte, yet we think it by no means unlikely that she may be able to retard them. If the intelligence which we have quoted above be really accurate, (and indeed it is derived from a respectable source,) then it seems probable that an immediate rupture must take place between the French and the Turks, and that a concerted attack will be made by the three Christian Emperors of France, Austria, and Russia, against the Grand Signior. Such a measure, though it appears but too likely to obtain ultimate success, must notwithstanding occasion a considerable delay, and give time to Great Britain for placing her Indian territories in a state of defence. The rumours of a probable rupture seem to be strengthened by advices brought in a vessel that sailed from Palermo on the 17th of April. Accounts were before her departure received from Smyrna, that the Turkish Government had actually refused to the French the permission of passing through Turkey to India: and, in the expectation of an attack, had caused the holy standard to be erected, and a levy of the people to be made en masse. It is rather extraordinary that Turkey should have formerly surrendered herself to the disposal of France, while she might have had the support of an English Fleet and a Russian Army: and that now, when the Emperor of the French is in league with the Emperor of the Russians, and the British Ambassador has been driven away from Constantinople, this same Turkey begins to bethink herself of resistance.

There are certainly two ways of viewing the great question of Indian Invasion. Bonaparte may be in earnest, or he may only be deceiving his soldiers. For a long time we were inclined to think that the project was not seriously entertained by this accomplished Statesman: and our reason for thinking so was, that we conceived it would be hazardous to employ, in a distant climate, so immense a force as must be necessary for the Invasion of India, while the affairs of Europe at home continued in so unsettled a condition. But Bonaparte has now found means of altering so completely the situation of Europe, that he may attempt this Invasion without danger to his power. He has managed to associate in his own interests those very potentates who were most likely to impede his plans: and with an artifice peculiar to himself, he has contrived, not only to remove their jealousy of his scheme, but even to employ their troops in the accomplishment of that object, which every body a couple of years ago must have believed those troops would be employed to frustrate: Instead of drawing off his own armies, and leaving his neighbours in possession of Europe, he sends the best part of his neighbours' forces a twelvemonth's march, and reserves his own efficient strength at home. This alteration of circumstances must make a material change in our way of thinking: and that project which at first appeared impossible, will not perhaps be now considered even imprudent.

If then there be a probability of such an Invasion (and against the worst it becomes us to guard), surely it is necessary for us to place India in a situation of defence, unless we deem it politic altogether to abandon our dominions there. We will not here enter into the great discussion, whether India ought to be preserved or not: we only contend that if the general opinion in favour of the preservation of India be a correct opinion, then the system and policy that has so long been pursued should be ended without delay. The resistance of the Porte, if it will not save us from the necessity, will at least afford us the time, of putting ourselves in a state of defence: and the system of defence that ought to be adopted in India is the same system that we have before stated as necessary for the cement of Bonaparte's Empire of the West, the same system that we shall hereafter take an opportunity of inculcating as indispensable for the preservation of Ireland. It is a system of gentleness substituted for a system of oppression. The colours of the human body, and the cultivation of the human mind, may vary in a thousand shades from India to the Pole: but from India to the Pole the human heart is the same: the claims of liberty, the rights of independence, the prerogatives of man, alike exist for every individual, and are alike required by every nation. Those who protect a people in the enjoyment of these blessings, that people for their own sake will in turn protect: but they who govern by tyranny, and coerce free beings with the chastisement of slaves, must expect, on the first opportunity of change, that those beings, having been reduced to slavery, and knowing that they have already endured the worst, will incur every danger for the chance of a better condition, and join the enemies whom the Government has not made it their interest to repel. What is now our footing in India? Do we not stand there by the terror of our swords? Have we not, from time to time, guaranteed to every Prince, and to every realm along its vast peninsula, their dignity, their power, and their independence? And have we not, in spite of all our guarantees, from time to time, degraded, deprived, and disgraced them? What have the people to fight for? A continuance of their bondage? What have the Princes to fight for? A perpetuation of their ignominy? No—it is in civilized nations only that man disposes of his freedom, and nobility sues for servitude!

Let the rights of the native Princes be restored, and the East India Company no longer throw the sword of conquest into the balance of commerce! Let British faith be re-established and preserved: then we may hope for the re-establishment and preservation of British security. But at present the natives have every thing to gain, and nothing to lose: they wait with impatience for an Invasion: they will hail it, not as a defeat, but as a deliverance. "Our enemies will march undisturbed up the country: and India and England will bow before the Conqueror of the European Continent.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XXI.

THE INDEPENDENT WHIG.

In The Independent Whig of last Sunday there is a long and flaming attack upon Lord Ellenborough for having refused a rule to Sir Francis Burdett. Mr. Clifford, as Counsel for Sir Francis, moved to set aside a verdict given against him (in an action brought by Mr. Morris, the high-bailiff of Westminster for certain expences of erecting the hustings at the last election) and to obtain a new trial. The ground of the learned Counsel's application was, that the decision of the jury was illegal, being contrary to the statutes 8 William and 18 George II. which restrict the sum to which the candidates are liable in such cases. Lord Ellenborough, in answer to this motion, observed, that the hustings were erected not only for the use of the poll-clerks, but also for the convenience of the check-clerks, and of the friend of the candidates, who were not within the contemplation of the statutes referred to. And in consequence of these observations, the rule was refused.

Sir Francis Burdett then complained to the House of this affair as a breach of privilege. He said that at the last election he had been nominated a candidate for Westminster, by some of the electors, without his knowledge, and that he had heard of it only when the business had been almost concluded. No law or custom had been shown to prove that in such a case the candidate was liable for the expences of the hustings, and yet the judge had directed the jury to find a verdict against him on no better ground, than that he had taken his seat in that House. Now, how was the taking his seat in that House to make him liable? It was not a voluntary act, for it had been done in obedience to a writ, by which he was compelled to take his seat, or submit to pains and penalties. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was of opinion, that no case had been made out by the Honourable Baronet in which the House ought to interfere; but the Speaker thought the matter important; and conceived that the Honourable Baronet, if he should find any practical consequences likely to result from the judgment which could give cause to complain of a breach of privilege, could not be too expeditious in bringing the business before the House and asking its interference.

These appear to be the facts of this interesting case. The comments of The Independent Whig are in the usual strain of stupid abuse:

"The electors of Westminster will here perceive, according "to the new doctrine of Lord Ellenborough, that their worthy "representative is, if we may be allowed to use a light expres-"sion" (observe the pun) "placed as it were between two fires. "If he take his seat in Parliament, in compliance with the "choice of his constituents, and in obedience to the laws of his "country, he is to be answerable for all the damages, and ac-"countable for all the expences, however extravagant or unne-"cessary, incurred by those who sent him thither; and, if he "decline, he is liable to pains and penalties for contumacy and "neglect. Was there ever any thing so monstrous and absurd?"

We do not find that Lord Ellenborough any where asserts the liability of the candidate for all the expences of his electors, however extravagant or unnecessary. This is merely a charge for necessary expences: a charge which certainly must be paid either by Sir Francis Burdett, or by his electors, and surely the friend of the people is too generous to ask the electors to pay expences, which though not incurred by him, were all incurred for him. If the High Bailiff had made an unreasonable charge, we should have been happy to see Sir Francis Burdett resisting it on account of its exorbitance: but to take advantage of the letter of two old statutes, when the spirit of those statutes certainly went a different way, does not to us appear a proceeding so honourable to Sir Francis, as to deserve the public comments of his friends. Even if we were inclined to allow that in the construction of these statutes, Lord Ellenborough argued without law, which by the bye we do not mean to admit, yet surely he argued with the greatest equity. It is necessary, according to the modern system of large elections, that there be check-clerks as well as poll-clerks; and in such a place as Westminster there ought surely to be some accommodation for the friends of the parties. But is the High Bailiff then to pay the expences of all the buildings that are necessary? Certainly not. "Nor the Candidates," says Sir Francis Burdett. Then the Electors must pay the bills, and treat their candidate. How shall we reconcile this with the following paragraph in the same article of the The Independent Whig.

"Sir Francis afterwards declares that he does not bring for-"ward this subject on his own account, but as it is important "to the Electors of Westminster, and material in respect to the "privileges of that House."

This is disinterested indeed! And Sir Francis's friends really do his reputation a great service when they represent him refusing such demands as the bill of the High Bailiff for the hustings and the Clerks!

But the most entertaining articles in last Sunday's Whig are, the extract that has been made from Mr. Miles's Letter to the Prince of Wales, and the Conductor's comments on it. In this Letter the Prince is warned that "a project is widely suspected "to suspend the constitution."

We remember to have been passing a few years ago through the village of Ross, in Herefordshire, when suddenly the church bells began to ring most loudly. The post was come in, and no news had arrived that could give occasion for any such boisterous exultations: but our curiosity as to the cause of the jubilee was soon gratified by the report of an old man, who stated that France was taken.

When we find it proved that France is taken, perhaps we shall believe that the constitution is to be suspended: in the mean time we content ourselves with enjoying the liberties that we possess, and regarding as equally distant the subjugation of our enemies, and our own annihilation.

The Independent Whig declares that secret rumour has declared Lord Wellesley to be the champion who proposes to carry this new measure into execution. Do the Conductors of this Paper imagine that Lord Wellesley is as mad as his old antagonist, Mr. Paull? Are these times in which any man, however pre-eminent in genius, however regardless of humanity, however devoted to despotic principles, will come forward and advise the overthrow of the constitution? Are they times in which Lord Wellesley himself, having all the talent which every body must allow to him, would venture on such a proposition, even if he had all the wickedness of which his enemies have accused him? The thing is worth nothing beyond a laugh. We have seen a good deal of merriment excited by a story which has been circulated in two or three companies, on good authority, concerning a philosopher of the present day. This gentleman was very intimate with Mr. Godwin and many of his disciples, and possessing talents of no mean order, was considered as an oracle by many of the new sect. A man whom domestic causes had rendered a little unhappy, wrote to him a letter asking advice as to the propriety of killing himself. The philosopher returned an answer to this effect:—

Dear Sir,—I have laid your letter before the principal members of our society, and, upon a thorough view of the case, they agree in opinion with me, that the best measure you can take is to kill yourself.

Believe me, dear Sir, your's very truly, &c. &c. &c.

Now, let us consider England, labouring under many misfortunes that have already fallen heavily upon her, and dreading others yet to come. She asks advice of her statesmen, and Lord Wellesley very candidly says:

Dear England,—You are in a bad way, and we have all been considering your case. Suspend your constitution: or in other words, stop your breath for a little while, I do not know that you will ever recover the faculty of breathing; but never mind that: your only chance is to put an end to yourself.

When Lord Wellesley says this, every body will laugh as much at him, as rational men do now at The Independent Whig.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH AND GOTTENBURGH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, MAY 7.—Several decrees have been published respecting the Imperial marine. Sixty battalions of marines are to be formed, who are to serve as the crews of 50 ships of 74 guns. All the sailors who are to belong to a man of war are at the same time to be cannoneers; the officers are made responsible for the instructions of their crew in manœuvres and in firing.

Ten battalions of marines have been organised for the flotilla. Each battalion of Imperial marines is to consist of four hundred and ninety-one men, Officers included; each battalion which is to serve in the flotilla shall form nine companies, consisting together, Officers included, of 1254 men.

A corps of 25,000 men is on the coasts of Normandy, concerning the destination of which various opinions are formed.

The Moniteur of yesterday, states a variety of circumstances concerning their Majesties the King and Queen of Spain, who arrived at Bayonne on the last day of April, where, as well as on the road, they have been received and treated with all the honour and distinction due to their rank. In half an hour after their arrival, his Majesty paid them a visit, which was of long duration. They reside in the Government Palace, while the Emperor and Empress have taken up their residence in the castle of Marrac.

Among the Spaniards who waited upon King Charles IV. and Queen Louisa, was the Prince of Asturias. After the usual salutation, their Majesties retired; the Prince was desirous to follow them; but the King prevented him, saying in Spanish, "Prince, have you not yet enough insulted my grey hairs?" This made a deep impression upon the Prince, and those who were with him.

King Charles expressed, with all the feeling of an offended parent, his pain at the conduct of the Prince of Asturias, repeating often these words, "Your Majesty knows not what it is to "complain of a son: this is the most cutting affliction that can "be conceived."

SWEDEN.

GOTTENBURGH, MAY 9.—On Saturday last arrived here, his Britannic Majesty's ship the Victory, Vice-Admiral Sir J. Saumarez. Colonel Murray, who came in her, set off immediately for Stockholm.

STOCKHOLM, MAY 6.—Lieut. Callerstedt, of the Life Guards, arrived here on the 3d inst. at night, with the following report, having been detained by the enemy nineteen days, between Sweaborg and the head-quarters of the army in Finland, which on the 25th of April still continued at Lumijocki.

The enemy having, on the 2d of March, driven in our advanced posts, and advanced against the town of Helsingfors, which was occupied by one battalion of the town of Adlercreuz, our troops were obliged to retreat into the fortress; all communication with the town was intercepted by the enemy, and the fortress summoned on all sides.

The 17th of March, the enemy opened a well-directed fire from a battery constructed on the Blackholmscliff. The 18th, 19th, and 20th, the enemy continued to keep up a brisk cannonade against the fortress, and threw numerous shells and red-hot balls into our work. The 21st March an Officer arrived with a flag of truce, and required a conference, the principal object of which was, that on our side the town should not be fired upon, in order to prevent the mischief which might otherwise be done to the distressed inhabitants; that, on the other hand, the enemy should not erect any batteries within the lines.

The 28th of March we discovered that the enemy were constructing a battery on the heights in front of Ulricaborg; our fire was immediately directed against that point, and answered by the enemy with bombs, shells, and balls.

The 29th, 30th, and 31st March, the enemy continued to cannonade and bombard the fortress without doing much mischief, as might have been expected; one officer and five rank and file of the garrison were killed, and 32 wounded. But in consequence of the excessive fatigues sustained by our troops, the number of sick amounted at the end of March to 515; and although we husbanded our stores with the utmost care, yet one-third of our gun-powder was spent at that time.

On the 3d of April another Officer arrived with a flag of truce, who was the bearer of a proposal from the Russian General to surrender the fortress in case that no succours should arrive; and after several conferences held on that subject, I this day concluded the convention which I respectfully take leave to annex to this report.

Your Majesty will most graciously be pleased to consider the imperfect state of this fortress, which can make but a very feeble defence in winter, when it is liable to be attacked on all sides, the extensiveness of the works, and the comparatively small number of the troops who were able to defend them, and from these considerations, I humbly trust, will not disapprove of a measure, to which I thought it my duty, although very reluctantly, to submit.

Sweaborg, April 7, 1808. C. C. CRONSTEDT.

CONVENTION,

Between their Excellencies Messieurs LE SCHUTELEN, General in Chief of his Russian Majesty's Forces, and M. DE CRONSTEDT, Vice-Admiral in the Service of his Majesty the King of Sweden, Chef d'Escadre, and Commandant of the Fortress.

PRINCIPAL ARTICLES.

There shall be an armistice between the Russian troops besieging Sweaborg and the Swedish garrison, from this day to the 3d of May, new style, of the current year 1808. If by the noon of the said 3d of May the fortress shall not have received effectual succours, by at least five ships of the line, it shall be given up to the Emperor of Russia; which succour it is to be understood is to have actually entered the port of Sweaborg by the hour appointed, and is to be considered as not having arrived if it has only come within sight of the place.

Of the three islands which shall be the guarantee of this convention, that of Langhorn shall be entirely given up to the Russian troops, who, however, shall not before the said 3d of May begin any works on the side opposite to the fortress. As to the two other islands, though occupied by these same troops, they shall be restored, provided the succour shall arrive before the time stipulated, precisely in the state in which they now are.

On the 3d May, new style, when the place is given up, the garrison shall march out with all the honours of war, on the same conditions, with respect to the ceremonial, as have been granted to the garrison of Swartholm.

All the Officers who are Swedes by birth have, if they desire it, permission to return to Sweden, engaging their word of honour not to serve against Russia or her Allies during the present war. The Swedish non-commissioned officers and soldiers shall be sent to Wibourg under a military escort, or other neighbouring places; all those who shall wish to remain under the dominion of his Imperial Russian Majesty shall take the oath of allegiance, and enjoy all the advantages offered to them by his Majesty's Proclamation of 19th (31st) March, 1808.

The Finnish regiments which enter his Imperial Majesty's service, shall not be employed against Sweden or her Allies during the present war, and shall enjoy the benefits held out to them by his Imperial Majesty's Proclamation, and especially by that of the 19th (31st) March of this year.

The regiment of Adlercreuz, after having taken the oath of allegiance, shall remain embodied during the present war, with the same advantages which it now enjoys. All that has been said with regard to the land forces, shall also apply to the marines and seamen. The civil officers, and in general all persons whomsoever, are in like manner included in these articles.

The fortress shall be delivered up with all its appurtenances, artillery, ammunition, and stores, of every description, and also with every thing belonging to the flotilla, no part of which shall be spoiled or destroyed after this moment.

The flotilla shall be restored to Sweden according to the particular return made thereof, after the conclusion of peace, in case that England should also restore to Denmark the fleet which she took last year.

In case that on the arrival of succours before the stipulated time, the Isles of Westerverto and Little Ostervarto must be evacuated, the Admiral engages to furnish for that purpose a sufficient number of troops, that the evacuation may be effected within twenty-four hours, during which time no hostilities shall take place between the Russians and the fortress, until the former shall have reached the shore in the isle of Lönnan, in front of Sweaborg.

Scuntelon,
25th March (4th April), 1808. C. O. Cronstedt.

SEPARATE ARTICLE.

Admiral Cronstedt having made the proposal that in case of the fortress having surrendered agreeably to the terms of this day's Convention, the debt of the military chest, not exceeding the sum of one hundred thousand rix dollars, Swedish Bank money, after the amount thereof shall have been duly ascertained, be paid by his Imperial Russian Majesty for account of Sweden. Count Buxhoyden, General in Chief of the Russian army, engages to demand the approbation of his Sovereign on that subject, and to exert himself to the utmost to obtain it.

His Majesty having received intelligence that Vice-Admiral Cronstedt, contrary to the orders given him, and after having held a Council of war, at which all officers of rank were present, has concluded a Convention with the Commander in Chief of the enemy's armies, by which he binds himself on certain conditions; and in case that no succour should arrive before the 3d inst. to surrender to the enemy both the fortress and the considerable flotilla which were now lying there, together with all stores. He finds their conduct to be of such a nature, that the Vice-Admiral, as well as all the Officers of rank who acted with him, have thereby forfeited his confidence; and accordingly his Royal Majesty thinks proper to dismiss him, as well as all the aforesaid Officers who shall not have protested against the above Convention, from his Majesty's and the Public service. May 4. 1808.—(Stockholm Gazette, May 10.)

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, MAY 16.

Some routine business was gone through and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 17.

Twenty-four Bills were brought up from the Commons, two only of which were public Bills, namely, the Assessed Tax Consolidation Bill, and the Paymaster of the Forces Audit Bill. Upon the former of these two, Lord Lauderdale made a few observations, and the second reading was appointed for Tuesday next.

DANISH CAPTURED SHIPS.

Lord Viscount Sidmouth rose to make his promised motion respecting the Danish ships captured and detained, previous to the actual commencement of hostilities with Denmark; he insisted the vessels to which he alluded had been wrongfully seized and detained, and that the House were bound to advise his Majesty not to appropriate the proceeds of such ships and cargoes; but, on the contrary, though it might be proper to indemnify British property, who had suffered by the confiscations of British property in Denmark, yet it was the duty of Parliament to advise that such proceeds should at least abide the event of the present differences between the two countries, and that the seamen should be given up. His Lordship then moved several resolutions—1st, assuming the position that the ships and vessels in question had been seized and detained previous to the commencement of hostilities; 2d, that the House should advise his Majesty not to appropriate the proceeds of such ships and cargoes, and that the seamen should be given up; and thirdly, that the act itself being contrary to the Law of Nations, was calculated to bring disgrace upon the national character.

The Chancellor admitted the laws of nations were eternal and immutable, but said that existing circumstances might vary their application. His Lordship concluded by moving the previous question.

A debate of considerable length ensued, which ended in rejecting his Lordship's resolution.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18.

Several private Bills were brought up from the Commons, after which evidence was heard on Major Bland's Divorce Bill; the parties examined were Dr. Erskine and Mr. Leland.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 19.

THE INDICTMENT BILL.

A debate of some length took place upon the Order of the Day for the second reading of the Indictment Bill, in which Lords Stanhope, Holland, Ellenborough, Erskine, Lauderdale, and the Lord Chancellor took part. The principal ground of opposition was, that the Bill intrenched upon the liberty of the subject, and that as a measure which went to change the law of the land, it was incumbent upon the promoters of the Bill to have given a more full and comprehensive explanation of its practical effect and operation than they had done. The clause, enabling the King's Attorney-General to proceed, in cases of information, against the party accused, without personal notice, was considered by Lord Erskine as a grievance of the greatest hardship, as it subjected the individual to be taken up under a Judges' Warrant, and compelled him to find bail or go to gaol, without being first apprised of the charge made against him.

The Lord Chancellor answered, that by saying that individuals, in matters of indictment, were compelled to find bail, and there could be no hardship in having recourse to the same provision in cases where the liberty and safety of the subject was, if possible, more seriously and solemnly attended to, than it possibly could before a Grand Jury.

A division was called for, when there appeared, for the second reading, 17; Against it, 7; Majority, 10.

The Bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Tuesday next.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 20.

The Roxburgh Cause was proceeded in, after which the Chancellor gave judgment for the Respondents in the Appeal Cause of Wemyss v. M'Queen and others, and affirmed the order of the Session. The case respected a second augmentation of the stipends of certain Clergy, and the Court of Session decided in their favour. The Chancellor, in his decision, supported the Clergy against the State; and Lord Lauderdale, in a speech of near two hours length, supported the State against the Clergy.

The Tanners Bill, and several private Bills, were brought up from the Commons; these were read a first time, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, MAY 16.

Mr. Byng brought up the Report of the St. Luke's Vestry Bill, which was agreed to, and the Bill was ordered to be read a third time.

A Message from the Lords informed the House that they had agreed to the Militia Pay, Cloathing, and Subalterns Bill, and the Irish Stamp Duties Bill, without any amendment.

Mr. Fuller gave notice that it was his intention to move, on Monday next, for leave to bring in a Bill, to prevent spreading the infection of the Small Pox.

BARRACK DEPARTMENT.

Mr. Abercromby observed, that according to the report of the Commissioners on the subject of the Barrack Department, there had been paid a per centage on the expenditure to the architects and others, to the amount of 105,000*l.* This sum was granted on the authority alone of General Delaney, and he was therefore of opinion that some measure should be taken on the recommendation of the Commissioners of Military Enquiry. He therefore moved, "That there be laid before the House an account of the sums paid to Architects and other Officers of the Barrack Department, on account of surveying the buildings, from the 4th of July 1799, to the present time, specifying the time such payments were made, and the names of the persons to whom they were paid."

Mr. Huskisson observed, that until the year 1805, General Delaney took upon himself the paying the per centage to the Architects, but it was thought by the Lords of the Treasury, that it would be more economical to give them from 1000*l.* to 1500*l.* a-year, which was done for some time; but to make these permanent situations, would it was thought be disadvantageous to the public, and as it was not intended to erect any more barracks, it was advisable to resort again to per centage, as it would be attended with a saving to the Country.

The motion was then agreed to, and also another for the production of an account of the sums not yet paid, and by whom claimed, and the claims not yet examined.

The Paymaster-General of the Forces Bill, on the motion of Mr. Long, was passed, and ordered to the Lords.

IRISH FIRST FRUITS.

Sir J. Newport rose and observed, that there were at present 1300 parishes, 900 of which did not pay First Fruits to the Crown, though, according to an Act in existence, the whole ought. At present the First Fruits did not yield more than 750*l.* a-year, and the object was to oblige all livings in future, above 150*l.* a-year, to pay First Fruits to the Crown, for the purpose of erecting Glebe Houses, and increasing the amount of the inferior livings of the Clergy in Ireland, and concluded by moving for leave to bring in his Bill.

Dr. Duigenan observed, that the Bill would take 30,000*l.* a-year out of the pockets of the poor Clergy, for the purpose of promoting their interests—(A loud laugh). The Church of England and Ireland was one and indivisible, and if this new valuation was extended to one church, it must be extended to the other. The want of Glebe Houses in Ireland was occasioned by frequent rebellions having swallowed them up. He was decidedly against the Bill, and denied that there was any act to the effect stated.

Mr. Foxsonby supported the Bill, and said, there were two Archbishopries in Ireland, the revenues of which were not less than 25,000*l.* a-year each, which ought to pay their proportion for bettering the condition of the inferior Clergy, and the Bill he contended was strictly consistent with the stipendary Curate Bill, brought in by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The House divided—For the Motion, 56; Against it, 67—Majority, 11.

TUESDAY, MAY 17.

A Message from the Lords informed the House that their Lordships had agreed to the Exchequer Bills Bill.

Mr. Haskisson moved for leave to bring in a Bill to enlarge the time of the Act for appointing Commissioners of Military Enquiry for a time to be limited.

THE CARNATIC.

Sir Thomas Turton said, he rose for the purpose of submitting some propositions to the House on the subject of the transactions in the Carnatic, of which he had some time since given notice to the House. As a politician, while acting in this country, in concert with Mr. Pitt, he admired the Marquis of Wellesley, but he could not defend his Government in India, as he had, with respect to that, to charge him with tyranny; and under such consideration he would be sorrow to see him now have any lead in the Government of this Country. The Hon. Baronet then proceeded to enter into an historical detail of the transactions in the Carnatic, the different treaties that existed down to the treaty of 1782, which was to be of benefit to the Nabob, and not to the public. He then adverted to the circumstance of a force being sent against the capital of Omdut ul Omrah, who beseeched on his knees that his palace should not be entered, which was complied with, but the troops of the Company were drawn round his palace, under the pretence of preserving the treasures which it contained being taken away. The unfortunate Sovereign was taken ill, and died, and the customary use for sepulture was not allowed, and the agents of the Company proceeded to investigate the affairs of the deceased, and to oblige his successors to proceed to business, though contrary to the Mahomedan religion, which permitted no business to be transacted within forty days after the decease of a friend. On this occasion the unfortunate Prince, who was the legitimate successor to the Musnud of Omdut ul Omragh, was dragged from the palace, and because he did not answer interrogatories which he could not answer, and because his grandfather was charged with having kept a traitorous correspondence with Tippo Sultan, he was despoiled of his property, and in fact made a prisoner. Here he entered into a long detail of his misfortune, in which he blamed the conduct of Lord Clive, and commented with much warmth and severity on that of the Marquis Wellesley; after which he read a long string of resolutions, corresponding with the topics contained in his speech, and concluding with a censure on the Marquis of Wellesley.

A debate ensued, in which Sir John Anstruther, Mr. Wallace, and other Members supported the conduct of the Marquis of Wellesley.

Mr. Windham then proposed that the debate should be adjourned to Tuesday next, which was agreed to.

The other Orders of the Day were disposed of, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18.

Mr. Gooch presented a Petition from several Farmers and others in the County of Suffolk, against using sugar and molasses in the distillation of spirits.

Ordered, on the motion of Mr. Lethbridge, that there be laid before the House an account of the amount of the sum received at the Post Office over and above 240,000*l.* from the 5th of April, 1793, to the 5th of April, 1808, together with the amount of the sum received during the same period, by Mr. Palmer, at the rate of 8000*l.* per annum.

CRIMINAL PUNISHMENTS.

Sir Samuel Romilly said, the question was, whether there was any defect in the criminal laws of the country with respect to capital punishments, and if there were, if it was such as rendered it expedient to remedy such defect. It was his object in the Bill which he would have the honour to introduce, to class the capital punishments, and to alter the law on the subject, for as it stood at present, the privately stealing in a shop or a dwelling-house was a capital offence, but not so, if the person who stole was seen committing the theft; his object was to repeal the act of the 8th of Elizabeth, which was a mass of incongruity, and a disgrace to the statute books of the country. The value of money had decreased considerably since the reign of Elizabeth, and yet the punishment was the same. By the Act to which he alluded, that which in fact aggravated the crime, operated against bringing offenders to justice. The object of his Bill was to class the crimes to be punished by death, transportation, &c. but to make the punishment certain, which would be the most effectual way to prevent the commission of crime. Such was the object of the first Bill which he would have the honour to bring in; and the next was a Bill to grant compensation to those who were tried and acquitted on being found innocent. He then moved "For leave to bring in a Bill to repeal so much of the Act of the 8th Elizabeth, as made it death without benefit of clergy, to take away property privily from the pocket of persons, and for other purposes."

The Solicitor-General said, with respect to the second object of the Learned Member, it was one of very great importance, and though plausible in theory, he was fearful that it would be impracticable in practice.

Sir Samuel Romilly then moved for leave to bring in a Bill for granting compensation to persons tried and acquitted, in consequence of the damages sustained in bringing them to trial.

After a few observations from Sir S. Romilly, he obtained leave accordingly.

LOCAL MILITIA.

The House went into a Committee on the Local Militia Bill, and proceeded to the discussion of a clause which determines the ages between which individuals are liable to the ballot.

Sir James Montgomery suggested an exception in favour of men having more than three children; and he also thought the hardship much greater on men after 30 than before, more especially where a poor shop-keeper, or any man settled in life, of small capital, whose income does not exceed 100*l.* a-year, who must, in this case, be driven to the necessity of serving to the ruin of his business, or paying a fine equal to one-fifth of his income, besides his liability to the Income Tax, which was already intolerable.

Lord Castlereagh said, he had no objection to accede to the amendment, and substitute the age of thirty, in the place of thirty-five, the service to commence from the age of 18, provided it was agreed to extend the period of Volunteer service to forty years of age. The Amendment was made accordingly.

The clause relating to poor Married Men subject to the Act, was, on the motion of Mr. Wynne, filled up with the words, "three children," instead of "one child," that being, as the Mover said, the constitution of the Old Militia.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 19.

Mr. M'Leod presented a Petition from the Freeholders and Justices of the County of Ross, against permitting the distillation of spirits.

POOR LAWS BILL.

Colonel Stanley moved the Order of the Day for the second reading of the Poor Laws Bill, relating to the removing Irish and Scotch Paupers to their own country, and for regulating the right of settlement.

Mr. Curwen said, he would oppose the Bill in the first instance, as he conceived its provisions cruel, unjust, and oppressive. He conceived unjust and oppressive, to send back a native of Scotland or Ireland to his own country as a vagrant, who had exhausted his strength in this country, which had all the advantage of his labour. He objected also to that part of the Bill which related to the right of settlement, and observed that it was necessary to alter the Poor Laws, as if one third of the poor rates were paid to benefit societies, it would maintain the indigent poor, and preserve to them that independance which should ever be the characteristic of the people of this country. For these reasons he moved that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

The House then divided, when there appeared, for reading the Bill a second time, 11; Against it, 114; Majority, 103.

POLYGAR PAPERS.

Mr. Dundas opposed the motion for the printing of the Polygar Papers, as being attended with unnecessary expence.

Sir J. Anstruther was also against the printing of so many Papers, as being attended with an enormous expence to the public.

Mr. Whitbread deprecated the idea of arresting the progress of investigation, however great the expence may be to the public.

The Papers were ordered to be printed.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

Mr. Ward obtained leave to bring in a Bill to enable the Governor and Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital to divide into one or more Livings, the Parish of Simonbourne.

COTTON MANUFACTURE.

Mr. Rose observed, that a Committee had sat a considerable time on the subject of the long existing disputes between the masters and journeymen engaged in the Cotton Manufacture, and heard a great mass of evidence, but did not come to any decision on the subject. He had read the evidence, and it appeared that some men worked six days in the week, eighteen hours a day, and did not receive more than from six to ten shillings per week for their labour. He was of opinion, that a menimum for labour may accommodate the differences, and therefore moved, "For leave to bring in a Bill for limiting the "excessive depression of the Journeymen employed in weav-"ing cotton-wool in England."

Sir R. Peele deprecated the idea of any Legislative interference with a manufacture which had so long prospered without any interference of Parliament, and was decidedly of opinion, that if the measure was adopted, it would be more destructive to the journeymen than the masters. He observed, that the depression of the trade was occasioned by the shutting the ports against our trade.

Mr. Perceval approved of the intention and motives of his Right Hon. Friend who brought in the Bill, but hoped that he would abandon it, as it would only lead to the casting a number of men out of employ, who bore their situation with patience, and would lead to an unmerciful selection of the best workmen by the masters. For these reasons he objected to the measure, and not on the grounds that the House was indisposed to listen to the complaints of the journeymen.

Mr. Rose said, after what he had heard he would not press the Bill on the House, and accordingly withdrew his motion.

DISTILLATION FROM SUGAR.

Lord Binning rose to make his promised motion respecting the Report of the Sugar Committee. The subject which the Committee had in view, was to afford relief to the West India Planter. They had found, in the course of their investigation, that the harvest of last year was more than usually deficient; and the consumption of the distilleries exceeded 479,000 quarters of grain; but the present situation of Europe left hope of importing the constant deficiency of consumption, amounting, on on average, to 770,000 quarters. With these conclusive facts before the Committee, they apprehended a scarcity, and to obviate that, they recommended, if found expedient, to put a stop to the distillation from grain, and substitute sugar for a given period; but in case of an abundant harvest, sufficient authority should be vested in the Crown to do away the restriction. He was well aware that one class of men should not be relieved to the injury of others; but it was an urgent case, and the landholders should not, by any means suffer, though distilleries were prohibited from using barley. Many witnesses, who had been examined, proved that the harvest was extremely deficient in England and Scotland; and it was considered that we were prevented from importing a sufficient supply of grain, it became a measure of [illegible] to put a stop to its consumption in distilleries. By adopting this measure it would [illegible] of barley; but that, he maintained, was impossible, as long as there would be a demand for it. Independent of this, it had lately risen from 46s. to 50s. and the small quantity on hand would always keep up the price. Should the House think it expedient to receive the report, and resolve itself into a Committee to consider it, he had only two resolutions to submit, namely, that all kinds of grain be prohibited from being distilled from the 1st of July to the 1st of October; and that it might be lawful for his Majesty, after the 1st of September, to discontinue the restriction, if found expedient; if otherwise, to continue it till thirty days after the meeting of Parliament; and in the Committee he would propose the reduction of the duty on sugar-wash. He concluded by moving, that the Report be referred to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. T. Coke said, that the Noble Lord must be very far misled in the quotation he had given of the price of corn, for within the last fortnight it did not exceed 40s. per coomb in the county of Norfolk; but if it had risen in other counties, he was convinced it was owing to the alarm given by the proceedings of the Committee of Enquiry. He was glad to find no grain had been imported into this country since the month of September, which was a strong proof that we did not stand in need of foreign aid. The markets had ever since been well supplied, at modern prices; but the imported grain had always lain in the hands of speculators, who were constantly the instruments of enhancing the price. If he was rightly informed, the situation of the planters was not so bad as had been represented. At present there was a demand for sugar, and it had risen 6s. in the cwt. but though it was in so great abundance, the public could not get it a farthing cheaper than when there was a scarcity. The landed interest had complaints also, in being heavily taxed, yet not a murmur escaped.

Mr Perceval, under the most accurate review he could bestow on the subject, supported the motion.

Mr. Windham and Mr. W. Smith spoke against the motion, and, after a long conversation a division took place, when the numbers were, for the Committee, 122; against it, 188; majority for the prohibition, 14.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 20.

Sir Samuel Romilly brought in the Bill for granting Compensation to Persons acquitted, which was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time this day se'nnight, and printed.

The Tanners Bill, after a few observations made against it by Mr. T. Jones, was passed, and ordered to the Lords.

The Lunatic Asylum Bill was committed, Mr. Bourne in the Chair, and received several amendments, and the report was ordered to be received on Monday.

A Petition was presented by Admiral Harvey against permitting the Distillation of Spirits from Sugar, from several Landholders at Saffron Walden, which was laid on the Table.

CHILD STEALING.

The Bill to prevent the stealing of infant Children was read a third time, on the motion of Alderman Combe.

The Solicitor General moved an amendment, to make it a criminal offence, to harbour or carry away a child, for the purpose of lucre, or obtaining a reward, or for the purpose of begging, which was agreed to. The Bill was then passed, and ordered to the Lords.

Mr. Rose presented the Returns, according to order, of Non-resident Clergy, which was ordered to be printed.

The Duchess of Brunswick's Annuity Bill was read a first time, and was ordered to be committed on Monday.

MR. PALMER'S PETITION.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee, of the whole House, to consider Mr. Palmer's claim, when Mr. Lethbridge moved for leave to bring in a Bill founded on the Resolutions of former Committee, granting him in future two and a half per cent. on the improving revenue of the Post Office, agreeable to his contract with Government in the year 1759.

Mr. Bankes and Mr. Martyatt objected to it; when the Committee divided.—For the motion 63; against 31. The Bill was ordered to be brought in.

DISTILLERIES.

Lord Binning said, he understood, since he came down to the House, that an Hon. Member (Mr. Taylor) intended to bring on his motion respecting the Dardanelles, which stood for this evening. If so, he would defer proceeding on the business which occupied the attention of the House last night, respecting the Distilleries, though he was now ready to bring it forward.

Mr. Taylor said, it was his intention to bring forward his motion immediately, as it had been repeatedly postponed.

DARDANELLES.

Mr. TAYLOR then, in a speech of some length, but delivered in a very low tone, proceeded to descant on the Papers relating to the Expedition to the Dardanelles, on which he founded several resolutions, which gave rise to a debate, in which Mr. Thomas Grenville, and several other Members, spoke. After which Mr. Taylor rose in reply. The question was then negatived without a division.

OFFICIAL PAPER.

REDUCTION OF THE NATIONAL DEBT,

By Exchange of 3 per Cent. Bank Annuities for Life Annuities.

Veneris, 19° die Maii, 1808.

1. That it would tend to a more speedy and efficient reduction of the National Debt, and would at the same time be of material accommodation and convenience to the Public, if every proprietor of 3 per cent. Consolidated or Reduced Bank Annuities were at liberty to exchange, with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, such Bank Annuities for a Life Annuity during the continuance of a single life, to be named by such proprietor, or for a life annuity during the continuance of the lives of two persons, to be named by such proprietor, and of the life of the longer liver of such two nominees.

2. That, in order to give effect to the aforegoing Resolution, every proprietor of 3 per cent. Consolidated or Reduced Bank Annuities, who shall be desirous of exchanging any such Bank Annuities for a Life Annuity on the continuance of a single life, shall, by transferring to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt any such Bank Annuities, be entitled, during the continuance of his or her life, or of the life of some other person to be named by him or her, to receive (under such regulations as Parliament may deem it expedient to adopt) for every 100*l.* of such Bank Annuities, and so in proportion for any greater sum than 100*l.* of such Annuities, transferred to the said Commissioners, a Life Annuity of such annual amount, according to the age of the nominee, and the average price of such Bank Annuities on the nearest open day preceding the day of the transfer thereof.

3. That, in order to give further effect to the aforegoing Resolution, every proprietor of 3 per cent. Consolidated or Reduced Bank Annuities, who shall be desirous of exchanging any such Bank Annuities for a Life Annuity, in the continuance of the lives of two persons, to be named by such proprietor (of whom such proprietor may be one), and the life of the longer liver of them, shall, on transferring to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt any such Bank Annuities, be entitled, during the continuance of such two lives, and of the life of the longer liver of them, to receive (under such regulations as Parliament may deem it expedient to adopt) for every 100*l.* of such Bank Annuities, and so in proportion for any greater sum than 100*l.* of such Annuities, transferred to the said Commissioners, a Life Annuity of such annual amount, according to the respective ages of such two nominees, and the average price of such Bank Annuities on the nearest open day preceding the day of the transfer thereof.

4. That no person shall be admitted to be a nominee, either for the grant of an annuity for the continuance of a single life, or for the grant of an annuity for the continuance of two lives, and of the life of the longer liver of them, who shall be under the age of thirty-five years.

5. That the dividends payable in respect of the Bank Annuities, which shall be transferred to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, in exchange for Life Annuities, shall be received by the said Commissioners, and shall constitute a part of the funds applicable to the Reduction of the National Debt; and that out of the said funds applicable to the Reduction of the National Debt the said Commissioners shall pay the respective Life Annuities granted in exchange for such Bank Annuities during the continuance of the respective lives for which the same shall be payable; and that the said respective Life Annuities shall be payable half-yearly at the Bank of England, on the same days on which the Dividends on the Stock, transferred for the purchase thereof may be payable in every year; and the first payment of every Annuity shall commence on the same day on which the first Dividend on the Bank Annuities so transferred shall be payable to the said Commissioners; and that upon the death of any single nominee, or of the survivor of any two joint nominees, a sum equal to one fourth part of the Annuity dependant upon his or her life shall be paid to the persons entitled to such Annuity, or his or her Executors or Administrators as the case may be, provided the same shall be claimed within two years after the death of such single or surviving nominee; and that the annual sum payable for every such Life Annuity so ceasing as aforesaid, shall thenceforth revert to and constitute part of the funds applicable to the Reduction of the National Debt.

6. That for the purpose of ascertaining the effect of the measure proposed in the aforegoing Resolutions, with reference to the redemption of the Public Debt, a separate account shall be kept half-yearly, by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, of all Bank Annuities which shall have been transferred to them for the purchase of any Life Annuities, and of the Dividends receivable by them in respect thereof, up to the period of such account; distinguishing therein so much of the said Bank Annuities as shall have been transferred in the course of the next immediately preceding half year.

Also, a half-yearly account of the amount of all the Life Annuities granted by them up to the period of such account, distinguishing therein the amount of the Life Annuities which shall have been granted in the course of the next immediately preceding half year; and also of the amount of all the annual sums which, up to the period of the said account, shall by reason of the deaths of nominees have reverted to the funds applicable to the Reduction of the National Debt, distinguishing therein the amount of such annual sums as shall have so reverted in the course of the next immediately preceding half year, together with an account of the amount of Life Annuities then payable; and that in every such account shall be specified the excess in the whole amount of all the Life Annuities then before granted, above the amount of the Dividends receivable in respect of all the Bank Annuities then before transferred for the purchase of Life Annuities; and also the excess (if any) in the amount of the Life Annuities then payable above the amount of such Dividends.

And that a separate Account shall also be kept half-yearly of the Capital Stock, which, up to the period of such account, shall have been redeemed by the application of the annual sums which shall from time to time have so reverted to the said funds by reason of the deaths of nominees, and by the application of the accumulated Dividends of the Capital Stock redeemed thereby.

Also, an Account of the whole Amount of 3 per cent. Capital Stock, which up to the period of such account would have been redeemed by the excesses in the amount of the Life Annuities from time to time payable by the said Commissioners above the amount of the Dividends from time to time receivable by them in respect of the Bank Annuities transferred for the purchase of such Life Annuities, in case such excesses had been immediately applied in the redemption of 3 per cent. Stock, in the manner prescribed by the Laws now in force for the Reduction of the National Debt.

LORD GLENTWORTH'S MARRIAGE.

DUBLIN, MAY 14.—This morning, in the Court of Chancery, the Attorney-General (Mr. Saurin) moved the Court on the part of the Earl of Limerick, for an attachment against Mr. William Beaumont, of Sackville-street, an eminent Solicitor of that Court, and against his wife, Mrs. Beaumont, on the ground that they had advised and procured the marriage of Miss Edwards, Mrs. Beaumont's daughter, by a former husband, with the Noble Earl's eldest son, Lord Glentworth, who is a minor of only nineteen years of age, although a prohibitory order had issued from that Court, cautioning them against such proceeding, and that the same would be considered as a high contempt. Mr. and Mrs. Beaumont's affidavits were afterwards read, in order to oppose this application. Mr. B. admitted he was well aware of the intimacy that prevailed between Lord Glentworth and his daughter-in-law, but declared, that he had carefully abstained from taking any step to further it.—Mrs. Beaumont admitted she was made very uneasy by the continuance of that intimacy, which had become the topic of public of public conversation; that she had, in consequence, consulted with some female friends, who thought the business would be best settled by a marriage, and that an intimation to that effect was some way or other, though not strictly from Mrs. Beaumont, conveyed to the young couple, who, it was admitted, were since married at Gretna Green. The cause shewn against the attachment was allowed as to Mr. Beaumont, and Mrs. Beaumont was ordered to answer further personal interrogatories, the attachment not to issue in the mean time. Miss Edwards, now Lady Glentworth, is a beautiful girl of 17 years of age, and is niece to Sir Jonah Barrington. The Court was amazingly crowded. The Duchess Richmond was accommodated with a seat on the Bench, and near her were arranged all the fashion, rank, and beauty of

PROVINCIALS.

PLOUGHING.—The Ploughing Match for the Premiums of the Bath and West of England Society took place at Hunter's Hall in the parish of Kingscote, Gloucestershire, on the 10th inst. In a field contiguous to Hunter's Hall, (a two-years Clover Ley) which was lent by the public-spirited landlord of that Inn for the purpose. The ground was previously marked out in half-acres, for the choice (by lot) of such competitors as might present themselves. At the appointed hour, three ploughs appeared on the ground. They were all of that denomination of ploughs, called Beverstone, the sort almost exclusively now used in that neighbourhood. One was drawn by two oxen, with a driver; another with two horses, without a driver; and a third by one horse, without a driver. The two horses finished their half acre in 2 hours and 28 minutes. The oxen ploughed the same quantity of ground in 3 hours and 14 minutes, and the one horse the same portion, in 3 hours and 17 minutes. The performance of the latter was truly extraordinary, and gave rise to a bet on his capability, which is to be decided on the 25th inst. in the same field. Taking for their guide the rules laid down by the Society, the judges pronounced the plough drawn by the two oxen entitled to the first premium, and that drawn by the two horses to the second.

Lord Sheffield's bull, which so miserably gored an ox, at Fletching Fair, was, by order of his Lordship, killed on Tuesday last, although it appeared, that this powerful animal was not by any means the aggressor; on the contrary, he patiently endured extreme pressure from fourteen oxen that were yoked together, and not properly attended to by the man who had the care of them, until they had about half passed him, when on looking round, and observing the number that was to follow, he deliberately applied his horns in his own defence, and actually tossed the bullock that most annoyed him to the height of between four and five feet! which so terrified the others, that they set up an hideous roaring, which, it is rather extraordinary, was immediately answered by all the cattle in the fair-place.

A single tree, of but moderate size, standing near the house of John Bean, Esq. of Clapham, gives occupancy to 66 couple of rooks, whose nests, it is supposed, contain, at the least, 264 young ones, and whose daily industry, in providing for them, is the admiration of Mr. Bean's family.

On Wednesday evening, as the Dover and Canterbury mail coach was driving on the road near Northfleet, it went too near a bank, and pitched over, when the coachman and guard were thrown into a hedge, and much scratched with the thorns. A gentleman inside the coach fortunately received no injury.

On Thursday morning the body of a man named Norrell, was found hanging in his bed-chamber, at a village near Chichester. On cutting him down it appeared that he was quite dead, and that the deceased had very curiously lined the noose of the rope by which he was suspended, with velvet. He was about 45 years of age; and no other cause can be assigned for his commission of the rash act, than a hopeless passion he had conceived for a girl aged 17 years.

About nine o'clock on Sunday morning last, a man of short thick stature, about 45 years of age, having on a light coloured coat, thick waistcoat, three-quarter gaiters, and a clean flannel apron, was seen hanging on the branch of a small oak tree, near Penge, in Surrey; he was suspended by a course blue pocket-handkerchief, most artfully tied for the completion of this rash act, his toes touching the ground. In his pockets were found a number of state lottery bills and a piece of old netting, such as used by fishermen; he appeared to have been hanging several hours.

SATURDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

[The Gazette contains an account of his Majesty's ship Daphne, Capt. F. Mason, having cut out ten vessels from Flodstraad, on the coast of Jutland, laden with provisions, and supposed to be bound to Norway. The captures were made by three boats from the above ship, and the Tartarus two, all under the direction of Lieut. William Elliott. They were towed near the shore by the Forward gun-brig. They found the vessels moored close under the fort of the Castle, which mounts ten guns, with hawsers fast to the shore; and immediately on getting to them the alarm was given by some Danish boats; the Danes instantly forsook the vessels, and the Castle and three other guns began, and kept up a heavy fire of round, grape, and musketry: many of the shot went through the hulls and sails of the vessels; notwithstanding which the five boats cleared the harbour of all but two brigs, both light, and one of them with neither sails nor rudder. Only three men, and one by mistake, were wounded in the attack:

The Gazette also contains a letter from Capt. J. T. Curry, commander of the Royal George Revenue yacht, giving an account of his having captured the Passe Partout, mounting 16 guns, and manned with 44 men. The privateer had captured a brig and a sloop in ballast, and when discovered had just boarded a sloop.]

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

RESIGNATION OF FERDINAND—RESTORATION OF CHARLES. ATTACK ON MURAT, AND MASSACRE AT MADRID.

The Dutch Journals up to the 18th, received late yesterday afternoon, contain a long article, translated from the Moniteur of the 11th, dated Bayonne the 6th instant. This article gives intelligence from Madrid, written on the evening of the 2d, by which it appears that violent disturbances had taken place in that capital. This French account begins by stating, that ever since the events at Aranjuez, the people of Madrid had been in a disturbed state: that offence was daily given to the French; that for two days there had been numerous assemblies, which appeared to have some certain object in view. The cool and prudent part of the French and Spanish saw that a crisis was approaching, and wished to bring the multitude to reason.—The Queen of ETRURIA and Don FRANCISCO wished to go to Bayonne—The Grand Duke of BERG attempted to reassure them. He was surrounded as he was going to the Palace, and defended himself long, but he was on the point of falling when ten grenadiers rescued him. At the same moment a second officer was wounded by another croud. The great street of Alcala, the Sun Gate, and the great Square were crouded. The Grand Duke gave the alarm, and flew to his post—and a battalion of the French marched to the Grand Duke at the Palace, with cannon, where the disturbers had assembled.

A firing took place from two ranks, and in a short time the multitude were dispersed. General GROUCHY was ordered to disperse the crowds in the street of Alcala—thirty pieces of cannon with grape shot, and a charge of cavalry, cleared all the streets. Yet the insurgents, though they fled from the streets into the houses, fired from them upon the French soldiers. Generals GUILLOT and DAUBRIN broke open the doors, and all who were found with arms in their hands were put to death. General DURESNIL made two charges with cavalry on the square, and had two horses killed under him. The insurgents made for the arsenal to seize the arms and cannon—they broke in, but General LEFRANC arrived in time to save the arms. All who were in the arsenal were put to death. The French garrison of Madrid were alone engaged in this affair. When the firing of cannon was heard in the camps outside the city, the troops marched immediately.

When the Emperor received the tidings of the above business he went to King CHARLES, and met him coming from the Empress's, where he had dined; and on telling him the news, the King said, "I have foreseen this evil; those who set the populace on think they can restrain them." The King instantly resolved to appoint the Grand Duke of BERG Lieutenant-General of the kingdom, and at the same time sent Patents to the Councils of Castille and War. The King afterwards called the Prince of ASTURIAS to him, and read the Grand Duke of BERG's letter. He observed to him, "that he now saw the result of his criminal conduct in flattering the prejudices of the people, and forgetting the sacred respect he owed to the throne, and the lawful authorities. Popular commotions were like fire, easily excited, but it required another mind and another arm than his to extinguish them."

The next article is a letter from BONAPARTE to the Prince of ASTURIAS, dated the 16th April, in which he defends the PRINCE OF PEACE. He addresses him "My Brother," at the beginning; but in the body of the letter styles him only "Royal Highness."

The next is a long letter from King CHARLES to the Prince of ASTURIAS, dated the 2d May, relative to his conduct. The 3d article is the following letter from the Prince of ASTURIAS to the Infant Don ANTONIO, at Madrid:—

"I have sent the following letter to my dear father to-day:—'Honoured Father and Lord, in order to give you a proof of my love and obedience, and in fulfilment of your desire, I resign my Crown in favour of your Majesty, wishing you may enjoy it many years! I recommend to your Majesty the persons who have served me since the 19th of March. I rely on your assurances in this respect. I pray to God to preserve you many happy days.

'I throw myself at the feet of your Royal Majesty, the humblest of your sons.

'Bayonne, May 6. 'FERDINAND.'

FERDINAND then recalls all powers he had given to persons to fill different offices.

Thus, after all the commotion and bloodshed that have for so many weeks distracted and deluged the Spanish realms, every thing is restored to its ancient condition, and the power of BONAPARTE is probably established more firmly than ever. CHARLES is King, and BONAPARTE is Viceroy over him!

By the foreign news, which we have given in another part of the Paper, our Readers will see that the Russians have obtained Sweabourg, in Finland, by capitulation.—The Morning Papers abound with the severest censures on Admiral CRONSTEDT, for having surrendered this important position, and some of them even go so far as to assert, that he has been bribed to the surrender. Perhaps it was wrong in the Admiral to capitulate; and as far as we have any right to give an opinion, on a subject which military men alone can be competent to decide, we certainly think that his conduct is to be blamed—but to our minds there is something excessively ridiculous in the constant allegations of treachery that follow our defeats and those of our allies. Is England really as invincible as the modern plays represent her, and has she, like the load-stone, not only a virtue in herself, but a faculty of imparting virtue to those that are in contact with her, so that she and her allies can be conquered only by treachery? Let not the English people lay this flattering unction to their souls. We and our allies want skill, not courage, nor honesty. When we have placed our military system on such a footing that we may bring up good officers of our own, and gain the means of properly assisting our allies, we shall see no more instances of Russian and French gold prevailing against British, Austrian, or Swedish steel. Private letters state, that the Swedes have been defeated in Norway, and driven back to their own frontier. For the truth of this statement we do not vouch.

The Soleby frigate is arrived at Plymouth from Rio de Janeiro. She has brought intelligence that the PRINCE REGENT had arrived at the Brazils. Commodore MOORE, who went out with him, had been knighted; a new order of honour had been instituted, and the people were altogether in good spirits. Before she sailed the Surveillante frigate had arrived from England, having on board Mr. HILL, our Secretary of Legation.

In Portugal the condition of the people seems very pitiable. The following is an extract of a private letter:—

LISBON, APRIL 28, 1808.

"It is impossible for any person, unless he is an eye-witness, to form an opinion of the miserable state of this place. Since the departure of the Royal Family 19,000 inhabitants have left the country. Numbers have destroyed themselves; and others when reduced to the extremity of distress, have become prostitutes. All those, with the exception of a few who were employed in the Erario, Custom-house, and other public tribunals, have been discharged; and even the few who remained have had their salaries reduced to half what they earned before. The soldiers are put into the convents, and the officers quartered on the inhabitants. The church plate has been carried to the Mint, and coined, and is to constitute a part of the contribution of forty millions. The French troops are reviewed every Sunday, in the Rocio, by the General in Chief. The Portuguese arms are all abolished, and those of France now only appear; this is the present situation of things here."

Portuguese Journals received on Friday, announce the elevation of General JUNOT to the dignity of Marquis of Abrantes. The title is taken from a road through which the General effected a painful but glorious march. He has issued a Decree relating to the Emigrants, and forbidding all communication with the British Squadron.

The Portuguese Minister in this country is said to have communicated to Mr. Canning the agreeable information that his Government holds itself responsible to the subjects of his Britannic Majesty for all the losses which they sustained by the acts of the Portuguese Government prior to the Prince Regent's quitting Lisbon, but particularly for those which were occasioned by the decree of the 8th of November last. This is certainly very noble conduct on the part of our worthy ally, and we hope that the sufficiency of his means will keep pace with the honourable tenor of such an engagement.

The following is the account circulated of the pending negotiation between Mr. CANNING, and the American Minister, Mr. PINCKNEY:—

"Mr. CANNING offered to place America on the footing of the most favoured nations, in her commerce with and through England; that an arrangement should be made respecting the carriage of the produce of the West India colonies to European ports, without touching in Great Britain; but, lastly, that there would be no relinquishment on our part of the right of searching merchantmen for deserters."

Mr. PINCKNEY, it is said, having no authority to conclude a treaty on these terms, transmitted them to his Government. It is still reported that the differences are in a fair way for adjustment.

Considerable progress has been made in the House of Commons, in a Committee, upon the Local Militia Bill; one new clause of importance has been proposed and agreed to; the compulsory service is to extend to all the male population between 18 and 30, instead of 35, as originally intended; but volunteers, up to the age of 40, may enter into this force. Lord Castlereagh said, that it was not the intention of Government to train the men raised under it for 20 days successively, but to divide the space into two or more periods, to suit local and other conveniences, and to be fixed at the discretion of the Lords Lieutenants of Counties.

We understand that it is the intention of Government to reduce a considerable portion of the British Cavalry, which are now useless as to Continental service, and since the general establishment of Volunteer Corps are almost so in England.

The Merchants and Ship Owners of Liverpool have, it is said, been informed, that an Order from the Customs has been obtained, for the removal of foreign cotton wool coastways, under proper certificates; and also, that in consequence of an Order of the Privy Council, directions are forwarded to the Collector and Comptroller of the port of London, not to require the bonds hitherto demanded of 20*l.* per ton for British ships bound to the Brazils.

The Osage, with Mr. Pinckney, junior, and Mr. Lewis, charged with dispatches for the American Government, was delayed at Falmouth by an unpleasant circumstance. Her stores were seized, and it was not until after an explanation between Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Canning that they were restored, and the vessel sailed.

By the Hope cutter, which is just arrived in England from St. Domingo, we learn, that information having reached Jeremie, about the middle of last March, that Petion's forces were in possession of Port de Paix, an illumination immediately took place in that town, and its vicinity, upon the occasion. The Captain of the Hope, however, states, that immediately before his sailing, which was on the 30th of March, the cause of this rejoicing was discovered to be unfounded, as Port de Paix still continued in the possession of General Christophe.

We learn that a sort of hemp has been produced in General Christophe's provinces in St. Domingo, very little inferior to, and capable of answering all the purposes of the best Russian hemp. Government is said to have made an experiment upon both kinds on Thursday last, and to have found that the Russian hemp did not exceed that grown in the Haytian dominions in point of strength by more than one eighth. A great extent of country around Cape Francois will be sown next season, for the use of the British nation.

The Princess of Wales has a large new room fitting up in the complete Chinese style, at her house on Blackheath, for which the most eminent artists are employed. Her Royal Highness assisted in planning the arrangements, and, when completed, it will form a room of the most whimsical description.

The Pope's Nuncio arrived in town on Friday se'nnight. The Archbishop of Nisibi is nearly related to the Prince Regent of Portugal. The venerable Prelate, who is upwards of 70 years of age, sailed from Lisbon in a Portuguese ship, bound to the Azore Islands, with the intention of proceeding, as soon as possible, to the Brazils; but the vessel having been much damaged, the Nuncio, with other passengers, and the owner of the ship, thought it advisable, for the safety of their lives, to return to Portugal; fortunately, however, the Mediator met them at some distance from Lisbon, when Capt. Blamey welcomed them on board, and carried them to Plymouth, where the Mediator arrived on Wednesday last.

SINGULAR CHARACTER.—A man died a few days ago at a public-house in High-street, Lambeth, between 60 and 70 years of age, where he lodged 25 years: he was a painter and plumber's labourer. During the time of his being in his lodging he would not suffer a woman to enter the same, nor was it ever cleaned or swept during that time. Upon his being found dead by the people in the house his brother was sent for, when 10*s.* 9*d.* in money, 42 old shirts, 62 pair of stockings, 49 hats, coats, waistcoats, boots, and shoes, as many as would fill a common hay-cart. He always paid his rent regularly, behaved very quietly, and was looked upon to be an honest man; but there were found in baskets 75lbs. of old lead, and 32lbs. of iron, and a half bushel basket of broken flint glass, linen rags, &c.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday, his Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace, from Windsor, where he was received by the Dukes of York, Kent, and Cumberland. At two o'clock his Majesty held a private levee.—The following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:—

Lieut.-Gen. Leslie, on his promotion; Lieut.-Gen. Drummond, on being appointed Colonel of the 11th Regiment of the Veteran Battalion; Lieut.-Gen. Milner, on his promotion; Lieut.-Gen. Lord Paget, on his promotion; Admiral Domet, on being appointed a Lord of the Admiralty; General Lawson, on his promotion; Major-General Ward, on being appointed to the command of the First Brigade of Guards; General Watson, on his promotion; Lieut.-Gen. Cartwright, on his promotion; the Earl of Harrington, on his return from Ireland; Capt. George Parker, on his return from the Baltic, and on his being appointed to the command of his Majesty's ship the Aboukir; Lieut.-Gen. Barton, on his promotion; Brigadier General Campbell, on his return from the West Indies; Major-General Loft, on his promotion; Mr. Connell, on being appointed Procurator for the Church of Scotland; Captain Chetham, of the Navy, on his promotion; General Fox, on his promotion; the Rev. Dr. Inglis, on being appointed Commissioner from the Church of Scotland; General Durham, on his promotion; Baron Hompesch, on being promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-General.

His Majesty held a Privy Council; likewise a Council to receive the Recorder of London's report of the convicts capitally convicted the two last Sessions, at the Old Bailey; also the case of Bullock, the bankrupt; when, we understand, His Majesty was pleased to respite them all during pleasure.

His Majesty gave audiences to the Cabinet Ministers, and to Mr. Ryder, the Judge Advocate. Soon after six o'clock his Majesty set off for Windsor.

Thursday her Majesty compleated her 64th year, which was agreed to be celebrated in a private manner, by the assembling of the whole of the Royal Family, and a select party of friends, at Windsor. The Duke and Duchess of York, the Dukes of Cumberland, Kent, Sussex, and Cambridge, Lords Somerville and St. Helens, Generals Garth, Harcourt, and Dakin, arrived on Wednesday evening, and early on Thursday morning.

At ten o'clock his Majesty, the Dukes of York, Cumberland, Kent, Cambridge, Princesses Augusta, Sophia, and Amelia, accompanied by Lords Somerville and St. Helens, Mr. Buckley and Lady, Generals Garth, Gwynne, Harcourt, Fitzroy, and Dakin, rode on horseback, in Windsor Park, till past twelve, when his Majesty returned to dinner.

The Royal Dukes and Princesses went to Frogmore to meet her Majesty, the Princesses Elizabeth and Mary; they remained there till past three, and then returned to the Palace to dinner at four o'clock, when the Prince, the Princess, and Princess Charlotte of Wales, and Duke of Clarence, had arrived.

THE FAUX PAS IN HIGH LIFE.

An event has just taken place in high life, which has excited more interest than we ever recollect any similar occurrence to have produced. The Lady, who was long the envied object of her own, and the toasted belle among the other sex, first charmed her seducer, by the exhibition of her picture in the midst of a groupe of portaits of beautiful women, painted on one piece of canvas, expressly for a great personage, by a celebrated Artist. How long the amorous flight was in agitation is not known, but from the preparatory steps taken by the Lady, it is supposed her mind was long since made up. To give facility to her departure, her waiting woman was discharged three days previous to her going off: and all her cloaths were secretly conveyed away. About an hour before Lady B——'s departure, Sir A—P—, (not the Hon. Mr. J——), called at Lord B——'s house, and finding, on enquiry, that the husband was absent, he sent up his name; the servant was desired, after some hesitation, by the Lady, to admit Sir A. Shortly after, a few minutes only, they walked out of the house together, and have not since been heard of. The absence of the Lady did not excite any surprise until the hour of dinner. Lord B. was then much agitated. Lord M——th dined with him, to whom his Lordship communicated his suspicions, after having ascertained that his wife had not been detained at her father's house. Their Lordships devoted that night and the following day in endeavouring to discover the place of their retreat. Couriers were dispatched to all the post-masters and hackneymen in the neighbourhood. The fugitives could not be found, but there are good grounds to believe that they have not left London.

CITY.

Tuesday a Court of Aldermen was held at Guildhall, which was attended by the Lord Mayor, 15 Aldermen, the Recorder, Sheriffs, &c.

BREAD.—The Court inspected the Mealweighers' Reports, and ordered the price of Bread to be raised half an assize, or a penny in the peck loaf; the quartern loaf of wheaten will be sold for 11½*d.* and household 10*d.*

Mr. Wm. Howell, elected by the Court of Common Council to the office of Water-Bailiff, was sworn for the due execution thereof.

Thanks were voted to the Lord Bishop of Salisbury and the Rev. Mr. Dodd, for their Sermons preached at Christ Church, Newgate-street, on Easter Monday and Tuesday last; and to the Lord Mayor's Chaplain, for his Sermons on Plow Monday, the Fast Day, and the first Sunday in Easter Term.

The Billingsgate Duties were settled for the ensuing year.

Precepts for a Common Hall on Midsummer Day, for the Election of Sheriffs, Chamberlain, &c. were ordered to be issued.

The Lord Mayor, in pursuance of the Act of Common Council, nominated the following Gentlemen to be publicly put in nomination to the Livery of the several Companies, for Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, viz.

Alex. Champion, Citizen and Fishmonger.
John Cowley, ditto and Clothworker.
Christ. Taddy, ditto and Grocer.
Thos. Poynder, ditto and Tyler and Bricklayer.
Thos. Whipham, ditto and Goldsmith.
Martin Pearkes, ditto and Goldsmith.
Jos. Leigh, ditto and Glover.
Chas. Wright, ditto and Goldsmith.
Wm. Hammon, ditto and Draper.

And the Common Cryer was directed to give them notice of such nomination directly.

Wednesday at a Court of Common Council, which was held at Guildhall, the Committee of City Lands reported the state of the proceedings in Parliament, relative to Smithfield Market, which was read, and the Committee were instructed not to proceed further in the said Bill during the present Sessions.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when Captains Heming and Ross, of the Earl Spencer and Carmarthen, took leave previous to departing, the former for Madeira, Madras, and Bengal, the latter for Bombay.

The undermentioned ships were thus stationed: nd timed, viz. Davaynes, Bombay, to be afloat 8th June, sail from Gravesend 8th July; Tottenham, General Stuart, and Union, Madras and Bengal, to be afloat 24th June, and sail from Gravesend 24th July. The Court adjourned till Wednesday next.

THE THEATRE.

COVENT-GARDEN.

Although it is not usual for Newspapers to give any accounts of the performances exhibited for benefits, yet when such a tragedy as Shakspeare's King Lear is acted, and acted in so admirable a style as it was on Wednesday evening, we feel that we should do an injustice to our Readers in passing even a benefit unnoticed. The principal Characters were thus cast:—

King Lear, ... Mr. Kemble.
Duke of Albany, ... Mr. Claremont.
Duke of Cornwall, ... Mr. Jefferies.
Earl of Gloster, ... Mr. Murray.
Earl of Kent, ... Mr. Cooke.
Edgar, ... Mr. C. Kemble.
Edmund the Bastard, ... Mr. Brunton.
Oswald, ... Mr. Farley.
Goneril, ... Mrs. Humphries.
Regan, ... Mrs. St. Leger.
Cordelia, ... Miss Smith.

This play is certainly to be ranked among the most splendid productions of Shakspeare's genius. Perhaps, indeed, here, as in his other plays, the story is not conducted in what we now call a dramatic manner; that is to say the main effects are not regularly disposed in such a way as to relieve the minds of the spectators by an artificial alternation of incident and dialogue. Tate, by his alteration, has much improved the order of Shakspeare; but it is to be wished that he had inserted less new matter. We are glad to see the dreadful catastrophe of Shakspeare's original softened into a pleasing conclusion; but the loves of Edgar and Cordelia are exceedingly heavy and uninteresting, and are too like the other loves that one finds upon the stage, to be very like nature. Love is indeed a passion, which, when naturally and simply represented, is capable of exciting a stronger, a more various, and a more universal interest, than, perhaps, any other affection of the mind: but the magic lies in the nature, not in the name; and love, when it does not resemble nature, is the stop-gap, not the assistant of the fable. To persons who have not been in the habit of considering these subjects, it may perhaps seem a little extraordinary, that audiences, who so perpetually express the loudest disapprobation at unnatural representations of any other passion, should not detect and denounce false expressions of love. We answer, that audiences have no mode of estimating the truth of the exhibitions that are presented to them, except the comparison of those exhibitions with the feelings of their own hearts. If then a passion be described to a spectator, of which he has no prototype in his own heart, how shall he judge whether the description be accurate? No man can decide on the likeness of a portrait, who has never had an opportunity of seeing the original. Such is constantly the difficulty that an audience must encounter in judging the representations of love. Hope, and fear, and anger, and joy, all have felt, and all may judge in representation: but love is a passion too exalted for vulgar minds, composed of particles too fine to be caught by common senses: a passion that few have ever beheld in its purity, and that fewer still have, in its purity, ever felt within themselves. But love, when feelingly represented, touches so many of the springs of the human heart by its association with other passions, as jealousy, despair, joy, or grief, that it has an effect even upon the minds of those whom, when it is unmixed, it cannot move. If it be naturally conceived itself, it will blend readily with the annexed passion: if it be conceived by a poet who has studied it only from books, it will with difficulty be joined to the associated feeling. Thus the grief of true love is universally interesting: not because every body has felt true love, but because every body has felt grief, and the added hue of true love, like the first tints of a picture, gives brightness to the other colours, though it be not in itself perceived by the unpractised eye. On the other hand the griefs of love that is not real, move no sensation in the mind. The love is nothing, and the grief seems causeless. The uninformed spectator does not see more beauty here than the most feeling metaphysician: but he does not condemn, because he does not discern the fault. The general effect is cold: the scenes produce no emotion in any body: and the piece goes off flatly.

Such is the case with the love-scenes of Edgar and Cordelia. But whatever we may say of the manner in which the plot of this tragedy is connected, whether by Shakspeare or by Tate, we cannot but speak of the poetry with enthusiasm. The sublimity both of intellectual and descriptive writing, the discriminative delineation of character, the keen conception of satirical insanity, the illustration of filial and parental feeling and duty, in short, all the noblest excellences of Shakspeare's mind blaze gloriously through this splendid tragedy.

Mr. Kemble, in the character of Lear, had wound himself to the top of his compass; and he exhibited, in a manner admirable and astonishing, all those touches of nature, and all those bursts of poetry, that combine in so remarkable a degree to render Lear the most sublime of dramatic characters. If in any expression Mr. Kemble fell beneath that exalted excellence to which the representation of such a part required that he should adhere, it was in his attempts at a tremulous tenderness. The tones of his voice are not well adapted to convey tender feeling; and perhaps he would do better in laying less stress upon those passages which, however admirably he may conceive them, his physical powers will not enable him to express. Mr. Kemble is not the zephyr, but the storm: sublimity is the characteristic of his genius, not sweetness. His curse on Goneril, at the conclusion of the first act, was one of those mighty bursts of magnificent passion, which immortalize the actor, by elevating and transporting the audience. The imagination of the spectator is uphorne into the grandeur of infinite expanse; and the judgment of the critic, though not overthrown, is hurried away. Perhaps the effect of this passage was heightened by the air of infirmity which Mr. Kemble threw into the whole character.

Mr. Cooke was a little too sly for the plain, blunt Kent; but a good deal of his acting was very forcible. His first dress was handsome; but his disguise made him look like Bobadil.

Mr. C. Kemble acted Edgar with judgment and with genius. His rapid and impassioned utterance in those scenes where Edgar affects madness, formed an admirable contrast with the real and quiet insanity of Lear. He who assumes a passion generally expresses it more loudly than he who truly feels it.

Miss Smith was the Cordelia. Cordelia should be more tender and more passionate than Miss Smith represents her. Miss Smith has a habit of acting from her ear, rather than from her feeling, and perpetually throws the emphasis of a sentence on those words where the harmony of the passage seems to want energetic tone, rather than on those where the passion requires a rapid, forcible, or tender utterance. It seems to us that she would do wisely if, in preparing herself, she were to study the sense before she learns the words, instead of letting the beauty of the words get the previous possession of her imagination, and exclude the sense.

An interlude was then performed, called The Day after the Marriage; or, the Wife's first Lesson. It is a pretty little drama, and has a good deal the air of a French piece. A lady of violent temper is, on the second day of her honey-moon, completely cured by her husband, who, counterfeiting a similar vehemence of disposition, does so much mischief, as fully to convince his bride that she had better correct herself. Mr. and Mrs. C. Kemble played these parts in a lively manner, and the interlude went off very agreeably.

FINE ARTS.

EXHIBITION AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

63. Iris communicating to King Priam Jove's commands, that he should go in person to solicit from Achilles the dead body of his son Hector.—B. West, R. A.

Then down her bow the winged Iris drives,
And swift at Priam's mournful court arrives;
Where the sad sons, beside their father's throne,
Sate bath'd in tears, and answered groan for groan;
And all amidst them lay the hoary sire,
(Sad scene of woe!) his face, his wrapt attire
Concealed from sight—with frantic hands he spread, &c.
Pope's Homer's Iliad, Book xxiv. v. 195.

This picture is one of the most remarkable examples that we ever remember to have beheld, of executive science wasted upon weak conception. No man, unless he knows the art of painting, and can estimate the difficulties of expressing by little touches of light and shadow all those lesser effects, which though not individually observed by the ordinary spectator, yet contribute in an incredible degree to the production of the great effect, will be likely to find out the smallest merit in this feeble work.

On the left hand of the gazer is Iris, with a wand in her hand: next to her is Priam, covering half his face with his robe: and on the right hand, and in the back and fore grounds, the old king's sons are occupied in lamentation. But among all these figures there is not one that deserves to be remarked for any of those excellences that constitute the poetry of painting. Iris is almost an ideot. Her right hand, holding the caduceus, gives one the idea of nothing but a steward at a public dinner with his wand, exhibiting his politeness by his affectation of grace. The left hand is spread with an expression of the most thorough imbecility even to the tips of the fingers. The figure of Priam is painted almost as big again as the figure of any one of his sons: a very forcible illustration indeed of the complaints which Nestor was always making about the degeneracy of the human race. But even this single figure does not preserve its proportions: for the foot is fitted to the bodies of the smaller figures in the same picture. In short, we can find no one point on which to praise this work of Mr. West, except the mere execution, which certainly has a great deal of neatness and flourish. But the picture at best is only like a writing master's copy, a long word of nonsense, beautifully penned.

7. Zara, deserted by Hassan the Camel Driver.—S. WOODFORDE, R. A.

Farewell the youth whom sighs could not detain,
Whom Zara's breaking heart implored in vain:
Yet as thou goest, may every blast arise,
Weak and unfelt as these rejected sighs, &c.
Collins's Second Oriental Eclogue.

To dwell on this charming picture would be some relief, after vexing ourselves with a contemplation of that which we last mentioned. But it unfortunately happens that what is really excellent affords little room for amplification. Where no faults are to be found, it is impossible to furnish such shadows as shall lend a contrast to the lights of criticism: and a mere enumeration of beauties would be no longer criticism, but description. We can therefore say but little of Mr. Woodforde's Mourner. The exquisite beauty of this interesting girl, the melancholy of her expression, and the softness of the general effect, leave us nothing to wish, unless that like Prometheus, we could bring the fire of heaven, and animate a creature so fascinating as Zara.

107. The Angels appearing to the Shepherds.—J. NORTHCOTE, R. A.

And suddenly there was with the Angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God; saying, glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men.
St. Luke, Chap. II. v. 13, 14.

The Artist has here produced a painting, which if it do not soar to the glory of the sublime, has at least the merit of the burlesque. True humour, it is said, is scarce in our times: and therefore a droll artist ought to be commended, even though he may have been droll without intending it. The general effect of the picture is that of the blue smoke that boys make round a candle by squeezing wet orange peel upon the flame: and in the middle of this smoke float some chubby cherubs, exhibiting, for the edification of the Shepherds below, the divine promise, which is given in the motto of the picture. But what makes this more amusing is, that the promise is expressed, like the motto of the Garter, on a piece of ribband: and not only expressed on ribband, but expressed in Latin. Yes, in Latin has the painter expressed the message sent by Heaven to the poor peasants of Bethlehem: and in a blue storm has he arranged that soft season,

When Jordan hush'd his waves, and midnight still Watched on the holy tow'rs of Zion Hill!—Campbell.

LAW REPORTS.

BISHOP'S COURT, DOCTORS' COMMONS, MAY 20.

BISHOP (HIS MAJESTY'S PROCURATOR) v. STONE.

This day the Rev. Francis Stone, Rector of Norton, in Essex, was called upon by the Court (Sir W. Scott) agreeable to its directions, to appear and revoke his error, for having preached a Sermon at the Parish Church of Danbury, before the Archdeacon of the Diocese, wherein he maintained doctrine contrary to the established law of the Church of England, by denying the Holy Trinity, the Divinity of our Lord and Saviour, and the atonement by the death of Christ.

The Registrar of the Court then read a written paper, signed by Mr. Stone, to the following purport:—That he was not aware by preaching this Sermon before the Archdeacon, he was offending against the Act of Parliament passed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; that he was well persuaded that the Ordaining Bishop authorized him to preach as he did, and that he promised and engaged not to offend again in like manner. It was contended by the Learned Civilians, on the part of the prosecution, that this was no revocation of the Rev. Gentleman's error.

The Rev. Mr. Stone then addressed the Court at some length, the tenor of which rather affirmed and maintained such doctrine, instead of being a revocation of it,

The Court was of opinion, it was not in its power to accept this written paper, or this verbal declaration of Mr. Stone, as a revocation of his error, and therefore directed the Registrar to enter upon record, that Mr. Stone had declined to revoke his error, and persisted therein. The Court then informed the Rev. Mr. Stone, that the sentence of deprivation must be passed by the Bishop of the Diocese, agreeable to the Canon Law.

The Bishop of London and the Bishop of Lincoln, accompanied by other dignified Clergy, then entered the Court, and after being informed by Sir W. Scott that the charges alleged against the Rev. F. Stone were clearly proved and established by the evidence produced, the Bishop of London proceeded to read the sentence, and afterwards signed the same, which deprived the Rev. Mr. Stone of his Ecclesiastical Preferments.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

TUESDAY, MAY 17.

PAXTONS, COCKERELL, AND CO. v. SIR HOME POPHAM.

The Court decided, that the bond for 3,500*l.* given by the latter to the plaintiffs, for goods, &c. on board the El Etrusco, bound to Ostend from Calcutta, was void, the consideration being an illegal transaction.

THURSDAY, MAY 19.

THE KING v. THOMAS APPLETON.

The defendant was brought up to receive the judgment of the Court, having been convicted of a breach of Quarantine Laws. The statute upon which he was tried affixes a penalty of 500*l.* for the species of offence he had been guilty of, and as he was not able to pay the fine, he was committed till the same should be satisfied and discharged.

THE KING v. WILLIAM HUTTON.

The defendant was the master of a coal ship, and was informed by the proper officer, while at Sunderland, that a general embargo had been laid upon all vessels in that port, and that he must not sail. The defendant, however, chose to put to sea, saying that his vessel was in ballast, and the embargo did not attach. The defendant was ordered to be imprisoned three months in the King's Bench Prison.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

Extract of a Letter from Captain Booth, of the ship Harvey, from Petersburgh for London, dated Helsingburgh, 24th April, 1808.

"I arrived here this morning, and have made application to Sir Samuel Hood for convoy to go to Carlsham, which he has granted, and appointed a frigate and a brig to sail as soon as possible. It is reported the Danes have sunk some old wrecks in the passage of the Sound; but the Admiral is now surveying the Malmo Channel, and his intention is to pass the ships through them. Pilots are appointed at Falsterbo for the use of the men of war. The Admiral has given me orders to write to the ships at Carlscrona to come to Carlsham to join the convoy. The force here is six sail of the line, two frigates and brigs. Sir Samuel gives us a convoy no further than Gottenburgh, where we are to take the regular convoy; he meant to place a line of battle ship abreast of Cronburg Castle before we passed."

The following outward-bound fleets sailed on Sunday from Falmouth, viz. the West India fleet, under convoy of the Bellette; the fleet for Quebec and Halifax, under convoy of the Avenger; the Mediterranean fleet, under convoy of the Cambrian; and the fleet for the Brazils, under convoy of the Lightning sloop of war.

ON BOXING.

The custom of Boxing appears to have gained ground very rapidly in this country during the last ten years; and for the whole of that period the press has groaned with the invectives of authors, who, in the excess of their morality, have found this amusement productive of infinite mischiefs to virtue, and of deep disgrace to the national character. We own that we have never been able to discover these evils. Every body knows that the Boxers are usually people of loose character, and dissipated habits, and we do not mean to dispute that the fact is so; but when it is recollected that they were people of bad morals before they became Boxers, it seems a little unreasonable to say that their bad morals are the result of their Boxing. They are often the keepers and the servants of low ale-houses; the friends, protectors, and landlords of idle fellows, vagrants, and even thieves: but they would be all this, just as much if a subscription purse had never been known to them. Now we maintain, that, on the other hand, the Boxers actually do a considerable service, however unintentionally, to society at large. By accustoming all classes of persons (for young noblemen are now as regularly taught to box as they formerly were taught to fence) to the occurrence of contests, the spirit, energy, and bodily vigour of the people is greatly promoted: athletic sports have been, in all ages, the characteristics of courageous nations: an early familiarity with danger, and a knowledge of those means by which danger may be most effectually obviated, give in great emergencies a confidence, an ease, and a presence of mind, which cannot but be productive of great comfort and advantage to the individuals who possess them, and consequently to that country of which those individuals are natives, and in whose service their energies are called forth. When every other quality of the mind, from memory up to genius, increases in strength and improves in conduct, by the frequency with which it is exercised, why should it be believed that courage is incapable of cultivation; or that a human being, whose progress toward excellence, by the laws of nature, is destined to be gradual and tardy, can in one moment, without the habitual excitations of a natural enthusiasm, without any of the coolness which custom alone can bestow, start up a hero at the exact instant when his heroism is wanted? The capability of great actions, the first principle of courage, is not perhaps to be created by training: but we conceive that it is to be rendered infinitely more tractable, useful, and disposable, by exercise and drilling, than it can have been formed by simple nature! and while manly contests can be kept up, as at present they appear to be, with little ill-will between the combatants or partisans, and with little bodily mischief beyond a bloody nose or a cracked rib, we cannot consent to join in the general outcry against a sport, which we must think so useful to the strength and spirit of the country, and consequently so creditable to the national character.

The vanquished Gregson arrived at Highgate on Saturday night, at which place he has taken up a temporary abode. He was visited by a vast number of Noblemen and Gentlemen Amateurs of the fist, several of whom made the fallen hero some handsome presents, the example having been set by the Marquis of T.—Gregson received a beating much more severe than that administered to him at Newmarket, and his face exhibited hideous marks of his adversary's death-like hits. He spoke in terms of enthusiatic praise of his conqueror's perfections in boxing, and said, that he never during the battle recovered the tremendous right-handed hit in the left jaw in the first round, which produced an effusion of blood, loosened his teeth, blacked his eye, and disordered his head in every part. The report that Gregson was neglected at Market-street, after the battle, is untrue. Several gentlemen called on him and left him presents, amongst whom was Capt. B. Gully's backer, who gave him five guineas. A considerable sum was also subscribed in the ring, which he immediately received. Gregson, it is said, will be matched against Crib. The following are other matches about to be made: Jem Belcher and Horton, Young Belcher and Cropley, and Dutch Sam and Nichols, the latter of whom beat Crib two years ago at Blackwater. The Game Chicken will again exhibit in a short time with any first-rate professor.

POLICE.

PUBLIC-OFFICE, BOW-STREET.

On Sunday evening, about half past seven o'clock, William Bacon, who has the care of Kensington Gardens, to keep out improper persons, received information that a young man genteelly dressed in black, was behaving in a very disorderly manner close to the Palace. In consequence of this information, Bacon went there and found a young man acting as he had been informed; he had thrown away his shoes and gaiters, had got a very black eye, and wanted to gain admittance into the Palace. —Bacon asked him what he wanted at the Palace? He made no answer. Bacon asked him if he wanted any of the Royal Family? To which he replied, he wanted to see the Queen, as he had been very much injured, and her Majesty could see him righted. Bacon then took him to the nearest public-house, searched him, and found in both his coat pockets a quantity of stones. He appeared in a melancholy state, and from his behaviour, Bacon suspected him to be insane, and took him to St. Paul's, Covent-garden watch-house, where he procured him a bed. Monday he was taken before Mr. Read. He appeared in a very low state. He said his name was Michael Smith, and that he was a Clergyman of Rochester. He proves to be the son of the late Dr. Smith, Curate of the Temple Church, and Lecturer of St. Margaret's Church, Westminster.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

DARING OUTRAGE.—On Thursday, Margaret Carrol and her son were charged with an outrageous assault and highway robbery on Sunday evening. The prosecutor, Fossey, is a waiter at the Bedford coffee-house, Southampton-row, Bloomsbury. On the evening he left the coffee-house, about eleven o'clock, immediately after a Mr. B. a merchant in the city. This gentleman was somewhat inebriated, and the waiter suspected that he was gone to an infamous house in Phœnix-street, which being in his road home, he heard great rioting and confusion as he passed it. Impressed with an idea that the gentleman had got into this brothel, and it being his wish to give him his protection, he waited a few seconds and peeped through the front parlour window to ascertain whether he was there or not. The son, who is chiefly employed in looking after and protecting the prostitutes of the brothel, rushed out of the house with his mother, knocked the prosecutor down, and treated him in a most outrageous manner. Surrounded by the ruffians of St. Giles's, the prosecutor sought mercy in vain, and after the hostess of the bagnio and her son had done with their harsh treatment, she gave the young man in charge of a watchman, and whilst in custody he found that he had lost his money, amounting to 2*l.* 7*s.* The Magistrate did not think the evidence was sufficient to establish a highway robbery, but the assault was of a most unprovoked and outrageous nature. Two witnesses for the defendants, in giving an account of the transaction, strengthened the prosecutor's case, and the brothel-keeper and her son were held in substantial bail to answer the complaint at the Sessions.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

About ten o'clock on Friday morning a fire was discovered in the two-pair-of-stairs of Mr. Faulkner's, in Marchester-street, Soho. The alarm was so great, that some of the lodgers threw their furniture out of the windows in the upper part of the house into the street, and by that means there was almost as much injury done to the different articles of furniture as if the force of the destructive element had overwhelmed them. There were some fire-escapes made use of, and a number of engines attended, so that upon the whole there was very little damage sustained by the fire. It was extinguished by eleven o'clock.

A young lady, 16 years of age, of the name of Marsden, niece to Mrs. Broker, of Brompton-road, was run over on Tuesday morning, at Knightsbridge, by one of the Bath coaches, and so much injured that her life is despaired of. She was in company with another young woman and a child three years old, and the former had run across the road at the moment the coach was passing at a moderate rate, and on Miss Marsden attempting to do the same, she was knocked down by the wheel horse. The coachman stopped his horses as quick as possible, and no blame could be attached to him. The young lady had a leg broken, besides being bruised with the forewheel of the coach passing over her.

Wednesday morning, between four and five o'clock, the street door of Mr. Digoam, of Newcastle-street, was forced open, afterwards the bar door, and then the tills, one of which, containing a quantity of copper, was taken away, with what else of value they could get. It is to be regretted that the watchmen go off duty, in St. Clement's parish, between three and four o'clock. The thieves had nearly broke into the Bunch of Grapes public-house, in Houghton-street, just adjoining, at the same hour; but the landlord was alarmed and roused them.

A child about four months old was left at the door of Mrs. Mansel, in Mary-le-bone New Road, on Monday night, wrapped up in a flannel shirt, and deposited in a clothes basket. The family were retired to rest, and were disturbed by the cries of the infant at about one o'clock on Tuesday morning, when it was taken into the house and put to bed. The unnatural mother has not yet been discovered, but suspicion has fell on a late servant of Mrs. Mansel's, who has not been found.

MARRIED.

Friday, at St. Mary-le-bone Church, Lord Viscount Primrose, eldest son of the Earl of Rosebery, to Miss Harriet Bouverie, second daughter of the Hon. Bartholomew Bouverie.

DIED.

On Monday last, at her house in Gloucester-place, at an advanced age, Mrs. Elizabeth Cocks, sister to the late, and aunt to the present Lord Somers.

On the 14th instant, of a violent inflammatory fever, aged 39, the Rev. Thomas Percy, LL. D. Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, and nephew to the Bishop of Dromore.

Friday morning, after a long and painful illness, at Streatham, in Surry, Mr. Hector Mackay.

At Littlebourn, a few days since, Mrs. Mary Appleton, in her 100th year, who, to the very last, retained her faculties, and died without a wrinkle in her face.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER TWENTY-TWO.

ON THE CATHOLIC PETITION, AND ITS RECEPTION.

The interesting and important claims of the Catholics, have once again been brought before a British Parliament, and by a British Parliament again rejected. As the reiteration of defeat, and the recurrence of circumstances that render even future conquest hopeless, must necessarily lead to the abandonment of the desired object, it seems probable that the question of Catholic Emancipation will not be again brought forward during the reign of his present Majesty: and therefore we are desirous of recording, in a work that professes itself to be a National Register, those sentiments which it has always been the pride of our hearts to entertain, and which it will always be the endeavour of our humble powers to promote. If ever there was a question of great, and we may almost say, universal interest, it certainly is the question of Catholic Emancipation. The country divides itself into parties about a hundred petty taxes, that if they were never heard of, would never be felt, and agitates itself about the conduct of Generals abroad, who are increasing or diminishing the national influence without effecting one atom of good or evil in the generality of the individuals that discuss that conduct: but this is a matter that comes home to the business, and to the bosoms of men: it addresses itself to their domestic feelings: it involves the rights of promotion, emolument, honour, character, freedom: it involves every thing which is dear to all British subjects by nature, and which is secured to some of them by law: it involves the claims of four millions of men directly, and it involves the interests of all England indirectly. Those who feel for their own exclusion are concerned: and they too are concerned, who feel that the general security depends in great measure on the protection of every part, who feel that human nature is alike human nature on this or on the other side of the Irish channel, who acknowledge the birthright of British subjects, and are willing to extend to their brothers the privileges of their countrymen. Yet further, it concerns those who, from a mistaken policy, an infuriated bigotry, or a despicable servility, have been induced to deny the sacred claims of their fellow subjects: who have assisted to perpetuate slavery in a land of freedom, to encourage discontent at home while hostility surrounds us abroad, to dictate to reason the course of religion, and to degrade the honour, faith, and lately spotless purity of the British name. It is impossible for us to comprehend all that we would say in a single disquisition: but we hardly think it necessary to apologize to our Readers for occupying them more than once upon the theory of a question, which is but too likely to occupy them for a very long time in practice.

For those who argue this question in the Houses of Parliament, or in any other place where they expect to give actual and sensible assistance to the cause of the Catholics, it is totally useless to say any thing about the justice of the measure proposed. Little enough do men attend to the admonitions of justice even in their individual capacity: and when they are collected in a body, her voice is completely drowned in the general din. Conscience is stifled by example, more readily than by any other power: and many persons even think themselves justified in doing that for a party which they would have been ashamed of doing for themselves. Before some tribunals, therefore, it seems useless to argue the question on any other grounds than those of expediency: but with impartial people, who, though they have no power, yet certainly have an interest, in the settling of this question, justice may perhaps be a topic by no means unimportant nor unnecessary.

We shall confine ourselves, in the present Number, to a historical account of the origin of these disabilities, and a statement of the disabilities themselves as they at present exist.

Immediately after the Reformation under Henry the Eighth, popery began to be discouraged in this country: and, although, in the reign of Mary, its triumphs were tremendously enforced, yet when that fiery tempest had blown over, the Catholics were again subjected to many deprivations, forfeitures, and punishments. It was an indictable offence to celebrate mass, or to attend at its celebration: and there was a heavy imposition on every subject of any religion, who omitted to attend the established Church, at least once every Sunday. During the reign of Elizabeth, there appear to have been some instances of severity in the execution of the laws to this effect: but mildness seems to have been certainly the general characteristic of their Administration. In Ireland they were little more than a dead letter. At that time the Catholics were not excluded from Parliament: nor fettered in the enjoyment or disposition of their property, in the rights of self-defence, or in the economy of their families. When in the reign of James the First the Protestants gained an ascendancy in Parliament, the laws were further enforced against the Catholics, and the severities of Charles occasioned the dreadful Rebellion in 1641. The soldiers of Cromwell expelled the Irish Catholics from their lands: and the Act of Settlement, after the Restoration, confirmed eight millions of acres to the Protestants who had seized them. The native proprietors, naturally eager to recover their lands, joined James the Second against King William, and during his short success, rescinded the Act of Settlement. William overthrew the last remnant of Catholic ascendency: and the articles of Limerick, which in 1691 concluded all hostilities, stipulated that "The "Roman Catholics should enjoy such privileges in the "exercise of their religion, as were consistent with the "laws of Ireland, or as they did enjoy in the reign of "Charles the Second: and that their Majesties, as soon

"as they could summon a Parliament, would endeavour "to procure the Roman Catholics such further aid in that "particular as might preserve them from any disturbance "on account of their religion." This instrument, which was granted, not in a moment of weakness and terror, but in the pacification that succeeded victory, was during the fourth year of King William, ratified and published in letters patent, under the great seal: And three years afterwards, in direct contravention of this hope held out by the King, was passed the celebrated Act for preventing the growth of Popery, of which the following is the history related by Burnet, and other cotemporary writers: a history which will serve to throw much light upon the question, and proves the fallacy of many arguments employed by those modern opposers of Catholic Emancipation, who are always extolling the steady policy of our ancestors.

The disposition of the King was known to be decidedly tolerant: and his Ministers, of course, had adopted his principles. However, the recent troubles and contests had excited a great prejudice among the people against the Roman Catholics: and of that prejudice the Opposition resolved to avail themselves, in order to discredit, and, if possible, to displace the existing Administration. With this view they introduced a very severe and preposterous Bill against the Catholics, not so much from any fear or detestation of that body, as in the hope that the Court party would oppose it, and so subject themselves to the imputation of protecting popery. The courtiers, however, were not the dupes of this manœuvre: and, instead of opposing the Bill in the Lower House, they added a variety of cruel and absurd clauses, which they conceived would certainly occasion the Bill to be rejected by the Lords, or at least sent back with great alterations: and, considering the temper which then prevailed between the two Houses, this return of the bill must have been as good as a rejection, for the Commons would have been sure to withdraw the Bill altogether. In this expectation, however, they were unfortunately deceived. The dread of popery, and still more the love of popularity, deterred the Lords from opposing the Bill: and it appears to have passed, against the real wishes of a majority of both Houses. This is the history of the English Act at least, which was avowedly the model of that which was passed for Ireland. By this latter Act, and the statutes that followed it, Catholics were disabled from purchasing or inheriting land, from being the guardians of their own children, from having arms or houses, from serving on grand juries, from entering the Inns of Court, from practising as Barristers, Solicitors, or Physicians, &c. &c.

At the close of the reign of Queen Anne, when the liberties of Englishmen stood on so triumphant a footing—to two thirds of the Irish nothing was left which could distinguish them from slaves or aliens, but the right of voting at elections: and this too was taken from them in the reign of the succeeding Sovereign, although from the peace of Limerick they had lain prostrate and unoffending.

Some of these disabilities have in this reign been removed; but how much still remains to be done, our readers will see by the following precise statement of those disabilities which still oppress the Catholics.

The Catholics of Ireland cannot sit in either of the Houses of Parliament, nor be appointed to any of the following offices:—Those of Chief Governor or Governors of this kingdom, Chancellor, or Keeper, or Commissioner of the Seal, Lord High Treasurer, Chief Justice of King's Bench or Common Pleas, Lord Chief Baron of Exchequer, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Judge in four Courts of Admiralty, Master of the Rolls, Secretary of State, Keeper of the Privy Seal, Vice Treasurer or his Deputy, Teller or Cashier of Exchequer, Auditor General, Governor or Custos Rotulorum of Counties, Chief Governor's Secretary Privy Councillor, King's Counsel, Serjeant, Attorney or Solicitor General, Master in Chancery, Provost or Fellow of Trinity College Dublin, Post-master General, Master and Lieutenant General of Ordnance, Commander in Chief, General on the Staff, Sheriff and Sub-Sheriff, nor (unless the Lord Lieutenant grant a written dispensation for that purpose) to the offices of Mayor, Bailiff, Recorder, Burgess, or any other office in a City or Corporation. No Catholic can be guardian to a Protestant, and no Catholic Priest can be a guardian at all. Catholics are allowed to have arms only under certain restrictions: and no Catholic can be employed as a fowler, or have, for sale or otherwise, any arms or warlike stores. No Catholic can present to an Ecclesiastical living: although dissenters, and even Jews, have been found entitled to this privilege. The pecuniary qualification of Catholic Jurors is much higher than that of Protestants; and no relaxation of the ancient rigorous code is permitted, except to those who shall take the oath and declaration prescribed by 13 and 14 Geo. III. c. 3.

There is scarcely an instance of the license of the Lord Lieutenant granted for the admission of a Catholic into a Corporation; and in practice and effect, the Catholics are still as completely excluded from serving on juries as if the privilege of service had not been accorded to them.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XXII.

SIR FRANCIS BURDETT.

IN a subsequent part of our Paper we have given some account of the dinner which was held on Monday last at the Crown and Anchor, to celebrate the anniversary of Sir Francis Burdett's Westminster Election. We will here say a few words of the speech which the Honourable Baronet delivered on that occasion.

The principal topic on which he dwelt was the necessity of a Parliamentary Reform. It is a little provoking to hear Sir Francis Burdett and so many of his followers exclaiming so loudly for a Parliamentary Reform, at a time when the dangers of the country are so great and so many, that it almost becomes a question whether we shall long have a Parliament at all. Sir Francis anticipates and denies this argument, declaring that times of great peril are most peculiarly the times for reforming what is wrong. He puts the case of a Captain of a ship, who when the vessel was going into action, should insist on keeping every thing on board in a state of confusion till the engagement was over. "What is it," says he, "that we, the stigmatised Reformers, say upon the present occasion? It is only this: Let the vessel be cleared out for action: let every obstacle that would encumber us in our defence be removed."—We will answer this case by another. What would Sir Francis Burdett think of a Captain, who in the midst of a dreadful storm, should take little care for providing against the immediate dangers menaced in the elements, but walk up and down the deck, holding curious consultations with his men about maritime niceties, and trying new experiments, Lord Stanhope's for instance, among the rigging and sails that ought to assist the ship in action? Yet such is exactly the conduct which Sir Francis Burdett prescribes to the Government of Britain. We are agitated by external storms, and he recommends it to us to enter coolly on the trial of domestic experiments.

Now, if the measure of Parliamentary Reform were a measure that to all parties seemed clearly advisable, and likely to be attended with no very material disadvantages, as is the case with the proposal for clearing decks before a battle, we should say at once, "Let us have a Parliamentary Reform." But when the great majority of thinking men are decidedly of opinion, that purity of Representation, however magnificently it may sound in theory, is absolutely impossible in practice: we own that we should be sorry to see a reform introduced, which would go to establish the influence of the rich in a degree much more dangerous than that in which their influence is at present exercised.

It is always to be remembered that the mischiefs which attend the present system of Parliamentary Organization, are balanced by certain very considerable advantages. As matters now stand, a great number of able and independent men come into the House of Commons by means of the Boroughs. Some of these Boroughs are entirely at the disposal of certain rich and great individuals: and of this Sir Francis Burdett and his friends very loudly complain. But it must be observed on the other hand, that these rich and great men, for their own sakes, are frequently induced to make that beneficial which in itself appears pregnant only with mischief, and mischief too of the most fatal and horrible description. For some of the powerful proprietors there are, who amid all their magnificence are in constant need of ready money: and these are glad to dispose of their boroughs to any body who is willing to buy them. Now it seems rather a paradoxical thing to assert: but the fact is that the most independent men in the whole House of Commons are for the most part the members for the rotten Boroughs: for they have paid so much money for their commodity; they wanted the importance or the conveniences that a seat in Parliament affords, and they have bought that importance and those conveniences for five or six thousand pounds. These men are dependent upon no creature. They are under no obligation to the great man who returned them, for he was paid for his goods. They are under no necessity of obeying the fictious rabble of a county, "the inconstant multitude, who like not in their judgments, but their eyes!" for their constituents are few and unimportant, the Mayors and Corporations of petty towns, people who know nothing and care nothing about politics, and whose concern with party goes scarcely beyond the knowledge of the separate interests that agitate two or three great families, distinguished by red, or blue, or orange cockades. What is the natural consequence? Why, that the members are more likely to vote freely. Certainly there are many of them who are willing to favour the schemes of Government: but of every political body it is fair and right that government should be assisted by somewhat more than half: and even if the proportion of these borough members who support government be in the ratio of three-fourths to one-fourth of those who befriend opposition, while Government has a proportion of seven-eighths among the county and city members, who approach, in their mode of election, much nearer to what is called a pure organization of Parliamentary representatives, even then the borough members are upon the whole a more respectable body than any other set of men in the House of Commons.

But the boroughs that are not sold by the great men whose influence reigns in them, are also attended with great advantages to the state: advantages which alone would, in our opinion, be sufficient completely to counterbalance all the mischiefs that the clamourous friends of constitutional purity are so perpetually and so factiously deprecating. These great men, having boroughs in their hands, are desirous sometimes of turning those boroughs to the increase of their reputation rather than of their wealth. Now every great man, from the time of Maecenas to the present day, has loved the credit of patronizing genius, though all great men have had not liberality enough to pay the due price for that credit. But those who prefer honour to money, or rather those who have already money enough, and want a little honour to grace it, are glad to gain, by the reflection of the talents of others, that lustre which perhaps they cannot shed from their own fires: and accordingly they put men into Parliament whose genius may be capable of exalting and publishing patronage. But for this system, we could hardly ever hope to see any man of talent in Parliament: for nobody who was not extremely powerful could expect to obtain the suffrages of his countrymen, if the full proportion of his countrymen had a right to vote at the election. Even for any one of the counties, where, according to the present system of election, every person possessing a forty shilling freehold has a right to vote, how difficult would it be for any man to gain a seat who had not great estates or family interest in that county! And how much must this difficulty be increased, if, as the Burdettites wish, each individual, whatever his property, were equally permitted to vote! Surely, if the whole country were placed upon this footing, the House of Commons must necessarily become a mere meeting of great merchants and country gentlemen. Now, among these country gentlemen it is not likely that we should find quite so many men of talent, as we find in the same number of Members constituting the Houses of Commons that are now organized. For it is not likely that six or seven hundred persons, picked out of the rich and landed gentlemen of the country, would afford quite so much genius as six or seven hundred men picked out of every class and denomination of the country. Besides, it cannot be denied, that at the present day the Merchants and country Gentlemen are by no means the independent persons they were formerly. They are now much attached to the Crown: and there is scarcely one of them that is not looking up to a Peerage, a Baronetage, a Colonelcy, a Lord Lieutenancy, or a County Receivership, if not actually to a place or a pension. It is very well known, that the persons who have a good deal, are not the persons that want least: and when we recollect how rapidly honours have lately been accumulated on rich Merchants, Aldermen, Bankers, County Members, and other people who seemed above the temptation of little offices or gewgaws, we cannot see much reason to wish for the adoption of a plan that must throw all the seats of Parliament, (with very, very few exceptions, in some districts where public spirit might be less inert,) into the hands of people so likely to be tempted, and so unable to resist temptation: while men of independent, but moderate property, who could pay a thousand a year for a seat, but who could not sustain the expence of popular elections, would be totally excluded: and not only these, but all the men of talent, who are now brought in at no expence to themselves, and who, having no money, could otherwise never be brought in at all.

In short, till Sir Francis Burdett can alter the nature of constituents, and prevent them from accepting bribes, it seems very improbable that Candidates, who are eager for success, will refuse to give those bribes; and if bribery is to be tolerated in the people, it seems almost a joke to rail so loudly against corruption in the Parliament. "Private vices," says Mandeville, "are public benefits;" and we think we have clearly proved, in spite of the Declaimers who hold forth at the Crown and Anchor, that the corruption of Parliament, like rotten manure, while it offends the senses, enriches the soil.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH, DUTCH, AND GOTTENBURGH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, MAY 12.—The Moniteur of yesterday contains the following articles:—

BAYONNE, MAY 6.—The following particulars are contained in a letter from Madrid, dated May 2d, seven in the evening:

The people of Madrid, since the events of Aranjuez, have been constantly in a state of ferment. Their pride and presumption had arrived at the highest pitch of which it is possible to form any conception. The victory which they had obtained over their King, the trophies with which they were elated, having satisfied from the two hundred carabineers, who formed the life-guard of the Prince of Peace, inspired hopes that every thing must give way to their fantacies and licentiousness. Every day were injuries done to the French; sometimes the guilty were punished in an exemplary manner; but the French always discovered the coolness and tranquillity of the strong towards the commotions of the multitude. It is true, that the good sense of the great body of the respectable inhabitants of Madrid, confined this disposition on the part of the French.

"Within these two days, the assemblages of the people were more numerous, and appeared to have some determinate object in view. Reports and proclamations in manuscript, were dispersed over the country; cool spectators of those things, as well Spaniards as French, saw a crisis approaching, and saw it with pleasure, for without some severe lesson, it was impossible to bring back the misguided multitude to reason.

"The Queen of Etruria, and the Infanta Don Francisco, indignant at the affronts to which they were daily exposed, asked and obtained permission to set out for Bayonne. The Grand Duke of Berg sent one of his aid-de-camps with his compliments, and assurances that they should sustain no injury; having reached the Court of the Palace, the aid-de-camp was surrounded by the assembled mob, but he defended himself long, and at last was on the point of sinking, when ten grenadiers of the guard advanced briskly with charged bayonets, and rescued him.

"At the same moment a second Officer was wounded by another mob. The great street of Alcala, the Sungate, and the Great Square, were covered with the populace. The Grand Duke caused the alarm to be beat, and every one repaired to his post, while a battalion of the Grand Duke's picquet with two pieces of cannon, advanced near the Court of the Palace, where the seditious were the most daring, being drawn up in a line, a firing began from two ranks. The grape-shot flew through the different streets, the arrayed crowds were dissipated in a moment, and the greatest dismay succeeded to the most extravagant arrogance.

The Grand Duke had sent orders to General Grouchy to scour the street of Alcala, for the purpose of dispersing an assemblage of 20,000 men, who were in it and the adjacent squares. Thirty discharges of artillery with grape shot, with several charges of cavalry, cleared all the streets; though then the insurgents took refuge in the houses, and began to fire out at the windows. Brigadier-Generals Guilot and Daubrin broke open the doors, and all who were found with arms in their hands were put to the sword. A detachment of horse guards, at the head of which was Duminesil, Chef d'Escadron, made several charges in the square.

This Officer had two horses killed under him, and General Grouchy had a horse wounded.

"While this was going forward, the insurgents made for the Arsenal to get possession of 28 pieces of cannon, and arm themselves with 10,000 muskets, which were there at hand; but General Lefranc, who, with his brigade, was quartered in the Convent of San Bernardino, advanced with his regiment by forced marches, so that the insurgents had scarce time to fire some cannon shot. All who were found in the arsenal were put to death, and fire-arms which they had begun to take from the chests, were again locked up in the armory.

"A great number of peasants from the neighbouring villages were summoned into the city before the grand attempt; but when they saw how speedily the insurrection was put down, they endeavoured to escape to the country; but they were watched by the cavalry, at the different outlets of the city, and all who were taken with arms in their hands were shot.

"The French garrison of Madrid were alone engaged in this affair, consisting of two battalions of fusileers of the guard, commanded by Colonel Friedrichs, a picquet of infantry, and five or six hundred cavalry. When the cannon was heard, and the alarm was given in the five camps, the divisions were formed, and advanced with rapid march towards Madrid: when they arrived, order was already restored; the garrison of Madrid, composed of 3000 men, was quite sufficient to bring all the insurgents back to their senses. Our loss is reckoned at 25 killed, and between 40 and 50 wounded. That of the insurgents amounts to some thousands of the lowest orders.

"The Junta, or Government Council, immediately gave orders for disarming the whole city; all good citizens rejoice at this regulation, and view with pleasure the punishment of those insurgents, who, had it not been for the presence of the French, would, by overturning the Throne of the late King of Spain, have annihilated the kingdom, and have plunged this brave nation into a state of headlong decay."

Letter from his Majesty the Emperor to the Prince of Asturias.

"MY BROTHER!—I have received the letter of your Royal Highness: in the papers which you have received from the King, your Highness's father, you must have found a proof of the interest which I have always felt for you. You will permit me, under the present circumstances, to speak to you with truth and frankness. I wished by my journey to Madrid, to draw over my illustrious friend to some necessary ameliorations of his States, and also to give a certain satisfaction to the public feelings. The removal of the Prince of Peace appeared to me to be necessary for the prosperity of his Majesty and that of his subjects. The affairs of the North retarded my journey. The events of Aranjuez took place. I pass no decision on what had previously fallen out, nor upon the conduct of the Prince of Peace; but I know well that it is dangerous for Kings to accustom their people to shed blood, or to seek to redress themselves. I pray God that your Royal Highness may never feel this by your own experience. It is not the interest of Spain to injure a Prince who has married a Princess of the Blood Royal, and who for a long time directed the affairs of the kingdom. He no longer has any friends; your Royal Highness will possess them no longer than while you shall be fortunate. The people willingly revenge themselves for that homage which they pay us. How can the process be drawn up against the Prince of Peace, without involving in it the Queen and the King your father? This process would give nourishment to hatred and factious passions, the issue of which would be fatal to your Crown. Your Royal Highness has no other right thereto than that which you derive from your mother. If this process degrade her, your Royal Highness destroys your own right. He who has leant an ear to weak and disloyal counsels, has no right to pass sentence on the Prince of Peace. His misdeeds, if he can be reproached with them, go to destroy the rights of the Crown. I have frequently expressed a desire that the Prince of Peace should be removed from affairs; the friendship of King Charles has often induced me to remain silent, and to turn away mine eyes from the weakness of his conduct. Unhappy mortals that we were! weakness and error, these are our mottos! But all may be arranged: namely, that the Prince of Peace should be banished from Spain, and I should invite him to a place of retirement in France. As to the abdication of King Charles the Fourth, that has taken place at a period when my troops were traversing Spain; and in the eyes of Europe, and posterity, I should seem to have sent so many troops [illegible] for the purpose of pushing from his throne my Ally and friend. As a neighbour Sovereign, it is fit that I should know his abdication, before I acknowledge it. I say it to your Royal Highness, to the Spaniards, and to the whole world if the abdication of King Charles has proceeded from his own will, if he was not driven to it by the insurrection and uproar at Aranjuez, I make no scruple to accede to it, and to acknowledge your Royal Highness as King of Spain. The circumspection which I have observed for this month past, must be a security to you for the support which you shall find in me, should ever party differences disturb you, in your turn, upon the Throne.

When King Charles made me acquainted with the events of last October, I was very much affected by them; and I think that by my efforts the affair of the Escurial received a happy issue. Your Royal Highness was much to blame; I have no need of any other proof of this than the letter which you wrote to me, and which I shall always desire to consider as not having come to me. Your Royal Highness must distrust all popular commotions and insurrections. A few of my soldiers may be murdered, but the subjugation of Spain shall be the consequence of it. I see with pain that some persons at Madrid have disseminated certain letters of the Captain-General of Catalonia, and have done every thing to excite disturbances among the people. Your Royal Highness perfectly comprehends my meaning. You perceive that I have touched slightly upon my points, which it would not be proper to enlarge upon.

You may be assured that I will conduct myself in every thing towards you, in the same way as to your Royal Father. You may rely upon my desire to arrange every thing, and of finding an opportunity of giving you proof of my perfect regard and esteem. Herewith accept, &c.

Bayonne, April 16, 1808.

Translation of a letter written in Spanish by the King Charles IV. to his Son, the Prince of Asturias.

MY SON!—The faithless councils of men who surround you, have brought Spain into a most distressing situation. The country now cannot be saved but by the Emperor.—Since the Peace of Basle, I have been always convinced, that it was the first interest of my people to preserve a good understanding with France, and I have considered no sacrifice too great to attain that object. Even when France was the prey of temporary Governments, I determined to repress my own inclinations, and be guided only by a regard to sound policy and the welfare of my subjects: but when the French Emperor had restored order in France, then my apprehension was in a great degree removed, so that I had then new reason for remaining faithful to my esteem of alliance. When England declared war against France, I had the good fortune to remain neutral, and thereby to afford to my people the advantages of Peace. England, soon after, captured four of my frigates, and made war upon me before war was declared. Thus was I compelled to repel force by force, and the evils of war were extended to my subjects.—Spain being surrounded by coasts, and being indebted for her greatest prosperity to her trans-marine possessions, suffered more than any other country by the war. The interruption of trade, and all the evils connected with that state of affairs were experienced by my subjects, some of whom were uncandid enough to throw all the blame on me and my Ministers. I had, however, at least the consolation that the country was safe, and had no reason to be alarmed for the preservation of my provinces. At the same time, I was the only King of Europe who lived in this security, amidst the convulsions of these latter times; and I should still have enjoyed tranquillity, had it not been for the advice which has turned you aside from the path of duty. You have been too easily led away by the hatred which your first wife cherished against France, and you have participated in her obstinate dislike to my Minister, your mother, and myself.

I resorted to the rights of a Father and a King, and arrested you when I found among your papers proofs of your guilt. But at the end of my career, about to become the prey of grief, I felt for the tears of your mother, and forgave you.

Meanwhile, my subjects were agitated by the false representations of a faction. From that moment the peace of my life was gone, and to the evils which had befallen my people, I had still to add, that distress which the disunion of my family had occasioned. Even my Ministers were slandered to the Emperor of the French, who, thinking he perceived that Spain wished to depart from her alliance, and seeing the disposition to disorder, even in my family, occupied, under various pretexts, my States with his troops: but so long as they remained on the right side of the Ebro, and appeared destined to maintain a communication with Portugal, I still hoped that he would return to those feelings of respect and friendship which he had always testified towards me. When I learned that his troops advanced towards my capital, I felt it necessary to assemble my army around me, in order to exhibit myself to my illustrious Ally in that state which became the King of Spain. Thus I expected his doubts would be removed, and my own interests adjusted. I recalled my troops from Portugal, and ordered those of Madrid to evacuate that capital, and directed them to assemble on several points of the Monarchy. This was not done for the purpose of abandoning my subjects, but, on the contrary, in order to maintain more worthily the glory of the Crown. My long experience convinced me that the Emperor of the French, consistently with his own interests, and the extended political system of the Continent, could entertain no wish prejudicial to my House. But in the mean time what was your conduct? You threw my whole Palace into confusion. You instigated my guards to turn against me. Your father was your prisoner. My Prime Minister, whom I had reared and adopted into my family, was dragged bleeding from dungeon to dungeon. You have disgraced my grey hairs; you have bereft them of a crown worn with lustre by my ancestors, and which I have preserved without a stain; you have ascended my throne, and have put yourself into the hands of the people of Madrid, who are instigated by the numbers of your party, and of the foreign troops that have entered the city.

The conspiracy at the Escurial was accomplished, and the acts of my Government were consigned to public contempt. Old, and loaded with infirmities, I could not withstand this new misfortune, and fled to the French Emperor, no longer as a King at the head of his troops, and surrounded with the lustre of the throne, but as an unfortunate and abandoned Prince. I have found a place of refuge and protection in the midst of his army. I am indebted to him for my life, for the life of my Queen, and for that of my Prime Minister. I have followed you to Bayonne. You have brought affairs to such a state, that every thing must depend upon the arrangement and protection of this great Prince. To have recourse to insurrections of the people, to plant the standard of faction, would be the ruin of Spain, and would reduce yourself, my kingdom, my subjects, and my family, to the greatest wretchedness. I have opened my whole heart to the Emperor. He is acquainted with all the insults I have received, and the usurpation imposed upon me. He has declared to me that he will never acknowledge you as a King, and that the enemy of his father can excite no confidence in the breast of a stranger. He has besides shewn me letters which contain proofs of your aversion with France.

Under these circumstances it is evidently my right, and still more evidently my duty, to spare the blood of my subjects, and not at the end of my days to adopt a course which would expose Spain to fire and sword, and reduce the country to the most wretched condition. Assuredly you ought, faithful to your duty, and to the feelings of nature, to have rejected the traiterous councils given you. Had you constantly appeared by my side, ready for my defence, and had waited till the usual course of nature had raised you to the Throne, then the political interests of Spain might have been brought to coincide with the interest of all. For these six months circumstances have been very critical; but such as they were, I should not have feared to meet them, supported by the good conduct of my subjects, and even my own feeble efforts, but, above all, with the moral power which I should have possessed in proposing to my ally an arrangement calculated to reconcile the interests of my subjects and my family. In depriving me of my crown, you have broken your own in pieces; you have stripped it of all that was illustrious, of all that rendered it sacred in the eyes of men. But your conduct towards me, and your intercepted letters, have erected a brazen wall between you and the throne of Spain. I am a King in the right of my ancestors. My abdication was a consequence of compulsion. I have, therefore, nothing to receive from you. I can consent to no meeting. I will consent to nothing that may occasion a civil war or insurrections. Every thing ought to be done for the people, but nothing by them, and to forget this principle is to make ourselves guilty of all the consequences which its neglect occasions. I have, through my whole life, sacrificed myself for my people, and, at the years at which I am arrived, I shall never do any act repugnant to their religion, their tranquillity, and their prosperity. But all my sacrifices will be forgotten whenever I am informed that the religion of Spain, the inviolability of my provinces, and their privileges and independence are secured; I shall then lie down in my grave, forgiving you all the sorrow which in my latter years you have occasioned me.

CHARLES.

Done at Bayonne, in the Imperial Palace, called the Government, May 2, 1808.

MAY 13.—The disturbances which took place at Madrid, in the beginning of this month, extended to other towns of the kingdom, but have, however, been less serious. On the 21st April, towards evening, the people of Toledo began to assemble in great numbers on the plain, crying long live Ferdinand the Seventh. The disorder reached such a height that the respectable part of the citizens could not suppress it. Furniture and property belonging to the Corregidore and other persons of distinction, were burned and destroyed. These disturbances continued all night, and next morning the Staff of the Corregidore, was taken and carried about in a procession, with a flag affixed to it, on which was the portrait of the Prince of the Asturias. The mob afterwards proceeded under the direction of two of the most worthless young men of the town, to the great plain, where they erected a statue of the Prince of the Asturias on a throne. They then directed their course towards the Council House, where the Cardinal and the Infanta came to the windows, and endeavoured to restore tranquillity. The insurgents, however, still kept up the cry of "Long live Ferdinand the Seventh," and compelled the quiet citizens to join them. Towards the night they attempted to attack other houses, but fortunately, at last, some Reverend Churchmen and brave Citizens prevailed on the rabble to disperse, and peace was restored; but it was necessary to patrole the streets night and day. Gen. Dupont, however, arrived on the 27th of April, with a corps of French troops. He was received with great joy by the citizens, and the tranquillity of the town was completely re-established.

The Official Journal of this day contains the following articles from Spain:—

"This day we have official intelligence from Madrid, of the 6th. Two days before, on the 4th of May, the Junta of the Government, in consequence of a letter received from the Grand Duke, and, in consideration of the difficult and extraordinary situation of public affairs, conferred on his Highness the Office of "President of the Junta." On the 6th, the following Proclamation was addressed to the army by the Grand Duke:

"SOLDIERS—On the 2d of May you were compelled to draw your swords and repress force by force; you have behaved well—I am satisfied with you, and have transmitted an account of your conduct to the Emperor. Three soldiers allowed themselves to be disarmed; they are declared unworthy of serving in the French army. All have now returned to order, tranquillity is restored, the criminals are punished, the misled have seen their error, a veil shall cover the past, and confidence must be restored. Soldiers, resume your former friendly relations with the inhabitants; the conduct of the Spanish troops merits praise. The harmony and good understanding which subsists between the two armies must be more and more confirmed.

"INHABITANTS OF MADRID.—Inhabitants of Spain, be tranquil; remove from your minds all that anxiety which the evil-disposed wish to excite; return to your wonted occupations, and see in Soldiers of the Great Napoleon, the Protector of Spain, only friendly troops—only faithful allies. The Inhabitants of all classes, of all ranks, may as usual wear their cloaks; they shall no longer be detained or disturbed.

"Madrid, May 6. "JOACHIM."

The Emperor has ordered that the names of the three soldiers, mentioned in the above Proclamation, shall be inserted in the Orders of the Day of the army. They shall, during a month, appear at the parade with a stick instead of a sword. His Majesty has imposed only this slight punishment, because these soldiers are youths, and he is persuaded that they will take the first opportunity of retrieving their character. Had they been old soldiers, they should have been dismissed from the army, for a French soldier who allows himself to be disarmed, has lost that which is most essential to a soldier—his honour.

SPAIN.

BAYONNE, MAY 6.—Our newspapers contain the following particulars respecting the journey and arrival of the Prince of Peace:—

"The Prince of Peace was, on his arrival, accompanied by Colonel Maries, Aide-de-Camp of his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke of Berg; he appears to have suffered much during his imprisonment. Not a day passed by during which persons did not come to his dungeon, and tell him he would soon be led to the scaffold. When he was taken from prison, in order to be delivered over to the officer who was to take him to Bayonne, he had a long beard; during a whole month he had no clean shirt he had no person to wait upon him. On the road, he had the consolation of receiving a letter from King Charles IV. and the Queen, full of testimonies of their affection. It is said, that on the King's letter, there were the marks of his tears. When Prince received this, he said, 'See there, the only consolation have had this month; every one abandoned me except my K the ungrateful, whom I had loaded with benefits did not to raise a voice in my favour. The Gardes du Corps, who sold their King, will sell his son also. I have no other ambition now, than to find an asylum in France, and have my children about me.'

"The officer who accompanied him shewed him on the way the newspapers which affirmed that he possessed a fortune of 50 millions. The Prince answered—'Slander will never cease to stain my actions; yet I dare challenge my bitterest enemies to lay any thing to my charge in this respect. Nothing further could be found by me than the sums necessary to discharge the daily expences of a house like mine. I possess no funds in England, France, Italy, or Genoa; and I can appeal to the Merchants of those countries. I have employed the benefactions which I have received from my Sovereign, in purchasing estates in Spain, which every one knows, and which have now been taken from me by injustice and arbitrary power. Having now witnessed the horrid deeds which I foretold, I wish now for nothing but peace and repose. The approbation and friendship of Charles IV. are enough for my conscience."

The following important document has been published here:

"By authority, travellers and the public are informed, that all passports, and other instruments, issued by the Spanish Government in the name of Ferdinand the Seventh, since the 19th ult. will not be acknowledged by French civil and military officers."

SWEDEN.

GOTTENBURGH, MAY 13.—The English expedition is arrived, and all the ships, nearly 300 sail, safe at anchor; it is said they will wait the dispositions of the King of Sweden.

The remainder of the gun-boats and other vessels given up to the Russians by the convention of Sweaborg, is said to amount to between 2 and 300, which will furnish the means of transporting a great number of troops, and place the capital (Stockholm) in imminent danger. It is reported, that some English ships of war are going thither; but it will be almost impossible to prevent the Russians from coming over within the innumerable rocks lying across the coast of Finland.

TURKEY.

BELGRADE, APRIL 17.—The hopes which had been formed of seeing peace re-established between Russia and Turkey without a fresh effusion of human blood, are from day to day diminishing, and all the disposition which we see, indicate the resumption of hostilities are very near. On the 16th of March, the Russian Counsellor of State Rodofinikin, residing in this city, received a courier from Bucharest, by whom he learnt, that since the the Porte refused to accede to any of the proposals made by Russia, and to make the renunciation of Servia and the other provinces required of her, and the truce agreed upon at Slobodja being about to terminate at the end of March, hostilities would immediately recommence. M. Rodofinikin imparted this intelligence immediately to the Servian Senate, requiring that all the necessary preparations should be made in Servia, for the prompt opening of the campaign. The demand of the representative of the Emperor Alexander was instantly complied with, and the greatest activity reigns at this instant in all Servia. Every where the troops are in motion; transports of artillery and ammunition are met on all the roads, and great activity prevails in the arsenals. The General in Chief, Caesar Georges, is returned to this city, from the journey he made to his estate at Topola, where he resided but a short time after the review of his troops. In order to facilitate the provisioning the fortresses of Servia, and that of the armies who are about to enter the field, the Senate has passed a resolution, prohibiting every kind of exportation of cattle. We have since learnt from Wallachia, that the head-quarters have been transferred again from Jassy to Bucharest; that Prince Prosorowski has issued an order, indicating to each corps its destination, and the General under whom it is to be placed in the next campain.

[Here follow some minute statements concerning the positions of the regiments.]

Intelligence from Bucharest informs us, that General Miloradowitz has been appointed Commander in Chief of the Russian army in Moldavia and Wallachia, in the place of Prince Prosorowski, who is obliged to return to Russia, in consequence of ill health.

BUCHAREST, APRIL 2.—The number of Russian troops in Wallachia is increasing daily. All the measures taken by the Russians there resemble the act of taking possession. The Russian General Milloradowitz has just notified to the Divan of Wallachia, that Prince Ypsilanti will have no further authority in those provinces; and he has nominated, provisionally to supply the place of this ancient Hospodar, a Committee of four principal Boyards.

It appears that Prince Ypsilanti had been but an instrument of which the Russians availed themselves to establish their power, and which they break as soon as they need no longer. This is the reward which the Hospodar who invited the Russians into the principality, receives for his attachment.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, MAY 23.

The Cork Duty Bill, the Child Stealing Bill, and several private Bills, were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

THE EARL OF SUFFOLK observed, that on a former night he had expressed a wish to know the amount of the Droits of the Admiralty, which being now ascertained, he was satisfied on that point; but seeing a Cabinet Minister (Lord Camden) in the house, he was anxious to be informed, whether Ministers intended to comply with his second wish, namely, to communicate the purposes to which so large a sum of money had been applied. He conceived it of the utmost importance that the public should be acquainted with the use to which those very large sums had been converted; if appropriated in a way beneficial to the public, Ministers surely could not hesitate to answer his question; he hoped, therefore, to hear a satisfactory explanation on this important subject.

No answer was given.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 24.

THE INDICTMENT BILL.

A debate took place upon the Order of the Day for committing the Indictment Bill.

LORD ERSKINE objected to that part of the Bill which enables the Attorney General, in ex-officio informations, to proceed without personal notice to the party, and said it was calculated to invade the rights and liberties of the subject; and should a bad man fill the office of Attorney General, might be converted into a dreadful engine of oppression.

LORD STANHOPE said no one could support the Bill; in short it was a "blasted" Bill, as it not only invaded the liberties of the subject, but was peculiarly oppressive to that class of people who most needed protection, namely, the destitute and friendless.

LORD HOLLAND said, it was so infamous in its principle that he should divide the House upon it.

A division then took place, for going into a Committee, 15—Against it, 6.

The Bill was then committed, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25.

The House met at two o'clock, and it was agreed that Counsel should be heard in the Banbury Peerage Cause on Tuesday next.

On the motion of Lord Stanhope, the 3d reading of the Indictment Bill was fixed for Monday next, and the House ordered to be summoned.

Twelve private Bills were brought from the Commons; after which Mr. Harrison was heard at the Bar on Major Blunt's Divorce Bill, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 26.

The House did not meet this day, it being Holy Thursday, or Ascension Day.

FRIDAY, MAY 27.

THE CATHOLIC PETITION.

LORD GRENVILLE rose, in pursuance of his notice, to move that the Petition from the Roman Catholics, recently presented to the House, praying that the disabilities under which they labour may be removed, may be fully considered in a Committee of the whole House, and to that end he should first move, that the Petition itself be read. This was accordingly done by the proper Officer, and the boon prayed by the Catholics was, that they may be permitted, in common with the rest of his Majesty's subjects, to fill the highest stations of the State, should they be found deserving, both with regard to the Military, Judicial, and Political Departments of the Empire. His Lordship then proceeded to enforce the claims of the Petitioners. He dwelt with great strength of argument upon the propriety of the present time and season for agitating the question. He said there was no doubt of the loyalty and patriotism of the Petitioners, and that the granting the boon they required would be the means of uniting and knitting together the hearts and hands of all his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects in one bond of union and concord. It would unite the cottage and the cabin with the palace and the mansion, and by dispensing the required boon to the more elevated, it would remove all cause of distrust and dissatisfaction from the bosoms of the low and indigent. Many of the disabilities had been removed, under which the Roman Catholics had at one time laboured, and the beneficial effects of such conduct had long since been manifest. That the Roman Catholics were deserving of that boon was apparent, or the Government would not have granted it. If, then, they had done nothing to forfeit that good opinion, it was time the Parliament of the United Kingdom realized the promises it had long since held out to them, and removed the further disabilities under which they laboured. It was time they enjoyed the same political freedom that others of his Majesty's subjects did, and as they were disposed to spill their last blood in defence of the British Constitution, it was but just they should enjoy its blessings in common with their fellow-subjects. If, however, his Majesty's Government should not grant the required boon to its full extent, he trusted something would be conceded, and the Petitioners convinced that the British Government were not wholly indifferent to their claims. His Lordship, after stating that the worst condition the Roman Catholics could possibly be placed in under the British Constitution, was ten times better than the most elevated station the Tyrant of France could give them, moved that the Petition be referred to a Committee of the whole House.

The Earl of Roden considered the Catholics to be in a state of oppression galling to their feelings; they were made objects of suspicion, in consequence of religious prejudices. He was attached to the Established Church as firmly as any man, but he never would flatter the Church when it expressed opinion contrary to the true interest of the nation. He gave his support to the measure.

Lord Hawkesbury regretted the agitation of the Catholic question at the present period, and he felt it his duty to oppose it. In doing that, he wished it to be distinctly understood that he did not mean to charge the Catholics with the illiberal opinions that were generally imputed to them. The progress of science and civilization had now eradicated these opinions which had proved so disgraceful to the votaries of the Catholic religion at early periods of our history. He should always feel it his duty to oppose the extension of a religion, which denied the supremacy of the Sovereign, and maintained doctrines contrary to what was enjoined by the laws of the land. It was essential to the existence of the British Constitution that the subjects should abjure the authority of all foreign powers, and those who maintained a contrary opinion could not reasonably complain of the laws that required it.

The House divided on the question. Non-contents 161. Contents 74.—Majority 87. Adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, MAY 23.

A new Writ was ordered to be issued for a Burgess to serve for Ryegate, in the room of Lord Royston, deceased.

Petitions were presented from the Chamber of Commerce in Glasgow, from the county of Norfolk, from Colchester, from the county of Surry, and from the neighbourhood of Rumford, against the Distillation of Spirits from Sugar.

Mr. Lethbridge brought in Mr. Palmer's Annuity Bill, which was read a first time, and was ordered to be read a second time on Thursday, and printed.

Mr. Rose moved for leave to bring in a Bill to prevent British ships captured by the enemy, and afterwards purchased by British subjects, from being entitled to the privileges of British ships.—Leave granted.

The Orders of Council Amendment Bill, with respect to Goods Warehoused, was read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Wednesday, and printed.

ROMAN CATHOLICS.

Mr. Grattan presented a Petition signed by a great number of Catholics, praying to enjoy the same rights as others of his Majesty's subjects, which was laid on the table.

Mr. Montague Mathew presented a similar Petition from the Catholic Freeholders of the county of Tipperary, which was also ordered to be laid on the table.—[Both Petitions were of an enormous length, and were signed by upwards of 100,000 persons.]

DOVER PILOTS.

Mr. Jackson presented a Petition from the Pilots of Dover, against the Pilots' Bill, stating, that the increasing their number would extend the patronage of the Lord Warden, and would be injurious to the freedom and independence of election. The Petition was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. Rose moved, that the Pilots' Bill be committed, for the purpose of filling up the blanks, and having the report further considered. The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee, Mr. Wharton in the Chair.

Mr. Rose observed, that a copy of the Bill had been sent to the Members of all the maritime counties, with whom he had held communications on the subject, and availed himself of the information he received. Every Gentleman with whom he communicated approved of the measure, as there was a great scarcity of Pilots. The number now was precisely the same that it was in 1792, though British shipping was increased three-fold, and foreign ten-fold, that entered the port of London. The object of the Bill was to increase the number of Pilots sixty more than they were at present, employed between Dover and the Isle of Thanet. With respect to the Petition presented, he thought its allegations were unfounded, as the friends of the Lord Warden actually tormented him in their application not to make any addition to the Dover Pilots, which was a proof that his Lordship did not wish for the patronage so much apprehended.

After a few observations from several Members, the Report was received, and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, in which the following sums were voted:—

147,179*l.* for the extraordinary expences of the Army, incurred from the 25th of December, 1806, to the 24th of December, 1807.

2,650,000*l.* for the extraordinaries of the Army for the year 1808.

500,000*l.* for the deficiencies of the extraordinaries of the Army in Ireland, for the year 1808, and 100,000*l.* towards the repairing of Henry the VIIths Chapel, to be paid without any deduction.

SUGAR DISTILLERY.

Lord Binning moved the Order of the Day for the House going into a Committe on the proposition for allowing Distillation from Sugar; which being read, he then moved, that the Speaker do leave the Chair.

Mr. Coke (of Norfolk) opposed the motion, on the grounds that to suffer the Distillation from Sugar would be injurious to the landed interest, as it would discourage the agriculture of the country, which had now arisen to that height of perfection as to prevent large sums from being sent, when the ports were open, to the Continent for a supply of grain. He cautioned the House to beware how it countenanced a measure which would be destructive in its effects, and therefore opposed the Speaker's leaving the Chair.

Mr. Ross supported the propriety of permitting the Distilleries to use Sugar for a time to be limitted, as recommended by the Committee, after the most patient and laborious investigation.

After several members had spoken, the question was loudly called for from all parts of the House, and a division took place. The numbers were, for the Speaker leaving the Chair 163, against it 127, majority 36.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved three Resolutions, conformable to the Report of the Committee.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 24.

This day being appointed to ballot for a Committee to try the merits of the Petition of Mr. Charles Morgan, complaining of an undue Election for the Borough of Sandwich, and there not being a sufficient number of members eligibly to make a ballot, an adjournment of course took place.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25.

Sir Samuel Romilly brought in his Bill for limiting the number of capital punishments, which was read a first time.

Ordered, on the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Bill for the better Collection of the Assessed Taxes be printed.

An account pursuant to order, was presented of the per centage of two and a half per cent. of the sum received at the Post Office, over and above 240,000*l.* per annum, which was ordered to be printed.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

Sir Francis Burdett said, the proceedings respecting the verdict given against him in the Court of King's Bench, in which the High Bailiff of Westminster was Plaintiff, had now arrived at that stage when, he was informed, from high authority, that he might with propriety, submit the subject to the consideration of the House, if he conceived it a breach of privilege. He felt no sort of interest in the business, but thought it a matter worthy of the serious consideration of the House, if they conceived that it infringed the privileges of Parliament. He was nominated a candidate for the City of Westminster at the last general election, without his knowledge or consent He was returned and took his seat accordingly, which he could not refuse without incurring the displeasure of the House, and he was therefore, by a charge of the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, held liable to the expences incurred at the election, though without his knowledge or consent in becoming a candidate. The House would consider the fact, and determine, if it thought fit, whether in such case its privileges were violated or not.

Sir Arthur Pigot observed, that it was necessary before the House proceeded, that it should be put in possession of the fact.

Sir Francis said, an execution had been put in his house for the expences attending the erection of the hustings, in consequence of the action brought for the same in the Court of King's Bench.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that to bring the matter forward on the grounds of a breach of privilege, the business must come in some tangible shape before the House. If the Counsel of the Hon. Baronet had taken a Bill of Executions, or had brought a Writ of Error, then the Record might be laid before the House, on which occasion it could deliberate whether its privileges were violated or not. On the contrary, the Counsel of the Hon. Baronet moved for a new trial, and the rule was refused, and consequently there was no proceeding of which the House could take cognizance on the subject.

Mr. Speaker referred to what had occurred on a former night. He did not then presume to direct the Hon. Baronet, but observed, when any practical consequence ensued, then he conceived that it was his duty to make a complaint to the House, if he thought its privileges had been violated or infringed. In such case the rule to be pursued was to move for a Committee to consider the subject, who, if they thought it not worthy to be entertained, would either proceed or not, as in the case in the complaints made against certain parties in the reign of Charles II.

Sir Francis Burdett said his sources of information were from the report of his Counsel, and from the notes of a short-hand writer. The Learned Judge on hearing the application said he was liable to the claim because he had taken his seat. This was the only point connected with the privileges of the House, because he would have violated these if he did not take his seat, and he was nominated as a candidate for Westminster without his knowledge or consent. He therefore having discharged his duty, left it to the House to determine what line of conduct it would pursue.

CATHOLIC PETITION.

Mr. Grattan moved, that the Petition which he presented from the Roman Catholics of Ireland, be now read. He began with observing, that the petitioners formed a very considerable portion of the electors of Ireland; they possessed a great share of political power, and they applied through the constitutional organ for a legal object. The Petition prayed for admission into the State and to the privilege of seats in that House. The Act of the 33d of the King gave the Catholics admission to political power; it admitted them to the constituency, and rendered them eligible to all offices, with a few exceptions. The removal of these exceptions, and the power of legislation, were also wanting, to place them upon a level with the rest of their countrymen. It was the policy of all nations but this to admit persons of every religious description into the service of the State. It was the practice in France, before the Revolution. In America, it had long prevailed. During the war which terminated in the independence of that country, the American Catholic was seen fighting by the side of the American Protestant, and not in unity with France, of which the religion was Catholic. England was at present without one ally in the world but Sweden the Protestant religion did not supply us with one, and would they then give up the only ally which they had at home? The objection therefore, on the score of political incompatibility, was as absurd as the argument in support of a moral incompatibility. But it was said the religion was to be considered as symbolical of the political sentiment. To this he would answer, that society had no right to impose an arbitrary test, and that the religious tenet was not to be considered as evidence of foreign attachment. But even if it were, it could not be made available in this case, for the object of it had ceased. The power of the Pope was now a name only; his authority, but a shadow. They were abjured, not only in all temporal, but in all mixed cases. The Catholics were charged with denying the right of the Established Clergy to tithes; they were charged with claiming them for themselves. They were charged with denying a legal existence to the Established Church; they were accused of a design to make their own the religion of the State; now, against all these charges, they have protested in the most solemn public manner. They renounce, in the most unqualified manner, the temporal power of the Pope, and they explain the extent of the spiritual authority which they recognize in him. With respect to their Bishops, they say the Pope only institutes, and gives a spiritual capacity, and that they nominate. But if this should be thought dangerous, he was authorized to make a proposition which must remove the possibility of any apprehension respecting the abuse of such a power. The Catholic Clergy were willing that his Majesty should exercise a negative upon the affirmative of their Bishops; so that no person could be elevated to that rank without the previous approbation of the Sovereign. If, therefore, there was any truth in the assertion that Bonaparte influenced the Pope—that the Pope influenced the Clergy—that the Clergy influenced the people, and that, by means of this gradation of influence, a great part of the army and navy was devoted to Bonaparte, here was an opportunity to get rid of all this influence, and the danger resulting from it. By the fundamental laws of this country, the Catholics form a part of the Constituent body. If they looked to the Constitution, they must agree with the Petitioners; if to the principals of the Revolution or the Declaration of Rights, they must agree with them; and if they looked to the duration of the Constitution, they must agree with them, because whenever danger should arise, where were they to look for assistance and support, but to the Petitioners. It is said, that if the Catholics are admitted to the privileges of legislation, they would endeavour to establish their own religion. But how were they to establish it? Circumstanced as property was, was there any likelihood that the Catholics would become the majority of that House; and if they were not, how were they to pull down the Protestant Establishment, and erect their own in its place? To hear some of the opponents of the Catholics, one would suppose that they were a race incapable of any virtue, and capable of every vice. He entirely agreed that the two Churches should be separate, and that the Catholics should pay their own Church. It is said, the oath of the King is incompatible with the admission of the Catholics. Their enemies first condemn the religion of the Catholics, and next apply to the piety of the Sovereign. The King, he would admit, was sworn to maintain the Constitution in Church and State, but he was not sworn to the eternal maintenance of the penal laws. He was sworn as to his executive, but not as to his legislative capacity. When Henry VIII assented to the Reformation, he departed from his oath. So did Elizabeth. So did his present Majesty, when he gave his consent to the Quebec Act—when he admitted the Catholic to the right of inheritance in 1782—when he admitted him to the professions in 1791—when he admitted him to the constituency in 1793—so that, according to the mode of reasoning employed by the opponents of the Catholic, all the best and the most gracious acts of his Majesty's reign were but a succession of perjuries. The experience of a century had shewn how foolish it was to think of governing such a country by a system of bigotry, or any system but the principles of a legitimate, constitutional Government. The Catholics did not come before that House as a few individuals, but as a people. They did not come with affected humility, to implore a favour, but to claim what they conceived to be a right. If, in stating their case, he had represented them in any other light, he had done them wrong, and he begged their pardon. They apply to you as freemen should to freemen. Austria had deserted you; Russia is your enemy. What do they ask but to share your dangers, and to go to the grave with you, should the fate of the battle be against you? It was upon these grounds he would move that the Petition be the table be referred to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. Secretary Canning said, he must agree with the Right Hon. Gentleman in all the abstract principles which he had laid down, of the necessity of civil concord and union, and more particularly in the present situation of the country, and the circumstances of the war; but he could not agree with him entirely as to the practical result of those principles. That it would be happy now, and that it was desirable at all times, to come to practical unanimity, was a question that no man could doubt. He must say, that he saw serious obstacles and objections to the measure at the present period, and so did the Right Hon. Gentleman who brought it forward. He appeared to despair of success, and therefore took a second course—that of giving advice and admonition to the Gentlemen of Ireland. His advice and admonition was, undoubtedly, of the highest value and importance; and he had no doubt, but that if it was followed, it would produce more real good than even the penal statutes now in force. If, however, the obstacles to the Petition were insurmountable, or if they could not be surmounted without objections greater than any practical good which could now be derived from the measure, he thought the Right Hon. Gentleman would do well to return the Petition to those from whom he received it; and he could now return it unsullied with any improper observation, and certainly without any injury having been sustained by the cause from the manner in which it was brought forward. The cause of his clients was certainly not deteriorated in his hands; and if the example of the Right Hon. Gentleman was followed by his friends, the discussion, if it did no good, would certainly do no mischief. Although he felt it his duty on the present occasion, to vote against the motion, yet he hoped the Right Hon. Gentleman would not suppose him actuated by any spirit of illiberality, or that he did not sincerely wish the question to remain as it is now, and without prejudice, to a future and more favourable opportunity. He gave the Right Hon. Gentleman credit for having stirred a dangerous question in a manner as little dangerous as possible, and concluded by deprecating a protracted discussion.

Lord Castlereagh said, that he must, on public grounds, strongly deprecate the present discussion of this question, as tending, in the present state of the country, to inflame and irritate the public mind when every means should be taken to appease it, and prepare it for the trial it might expect. It was highly impolitic and indecorous to make a question at such a crisis, whether the Irish Catholics were depressed, or participators in the benefits of that Constitution which it was their imperious duty to defend. He had set his face against the discussion of this measure before, as tending to create ferment, without any hopes of success, and on the same principle he should oppose it now.

After several Members had spoken, a motion was made to adjourn the debate, but it was negatived by a majority of 180. Upon the division on the main question, that the House resolve itself into a Committee, for the purpose of taking into consideration the Petitions of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, there were, for the Committee, 128—Against it, 281—Majority for the Motion, 153.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 26.

The Military Commissioners' Bill was read a third time, and ordered to the Lords.

The Honourable Mr. Ward moved for several accounts respecting the cloathing of the army, the furnishing them with great coats, and the prices charged by the Contractors, which were ordered.

Ordered on the motion of Mr. George Vansittart, that there be laid before the House an account of the sums paid into the hands of the Receiver-General, and levied in lieu of substitutes and personal service in the Militia, by persons ballotted for under the 44th of the King.

COMMISSIONERS OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. Huskisson moved for leave to bring in a Bill to enable the Commissioners for Auditing the West-India Accounts more speedily and effectually to investigate the said Accounts.

Mr. Baskes embraced the present opportunity to state, that the accounts of the army were 24 years in arrear, and it was absolutely necessary that something should be done to facilitate their investigation

Mr. Huskisson obtained leave to bring in his Bill, and also a similar Bill with respect to the Revenue Department.

MR. PALMER'S CLAIM.

Mr. Bankes moved, that the Account presented from the Post Office, respecting the per centage of the Post Office, be referred to a Committee to report thereon to the House, which was agreed to, and a Committee was accordingly appointed.

In a conversation across the table, it was understood, that the House should resolve itself into a Committee on Monday next, on the Local Militia Bill, and that no other business should interpose to prevent it.

The House then proceeded to hear evidence in a Committee on the Orders of Council, and afterwards adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 27.

Mr. Thomas Grenville reported from the Committee appointed to try the merits of the Sandwich Election, that Mr. Hanier, the sitting member, was duly elected, and that the Petition against him was neither frivolous nor vexatious.

The New Brighton Road Bill was read a third time and passed.

FISHERIES.

Mr. Rose, after adverting to the Bounties granted for the encouragement of the Fisheries, said it was necessary to make some alterations for the benefit of the Fisheries, which were of the first importance to the country, as not less than 230,000 men and their connections, including boat builders, &c. were employed in consequence of the British Fisheries. He therefore moved, "That 6*l.* per ton bounty be granted to the owners of every vessel of not less than sixty tons burthen, employed in the Fisheries of Ireland and Scotland; and that 2*s.* bounty be granted on every barrel of herrings caught in the British Fisheries."—Which motions were agreed to, and the report was ordered to be received on Monday.

STEALING ANCHORS AND CABLES.

Doctor Lawrence said, as the House had been just engaged on the subject of the Fisheries, he now wished to call its attention to the fishing for anchors and cables in the Goodwin Sands. These were in the first instances secret, and the marks obliterated from the anchors, which were sold as old iron, and the cables were disposed of as junk. It was true, great deligence was used for the purpose of seizing them, but when the Inspector went into the district where he had jurisdiction, they were removed to another where he had none, and the Magistrates had not the power to interfere.—Men of great opulence, and who held their heads high, trafficked in cables and anchors, which was an encouragement to fellows at night to cut the cables and let the vessels drift to sea, to the great peril of the parties on board. The object of the Bill which he would propose to bring in was, that all persons dealing in marine stores should be obliged to give notice accordingly. The second object of his Bill was to prevent the obliterating the marks; and the third object was to extend the jurisdiction of the inspectors, and to make an alteration with respect to the salvage. The Hon. Member concluded by moving, "For leave to bring in a Bill to prevent Frauds practised on Merchants, Ship-Owners, and Underwriters, in the Cinque Ports, by Boatmen and others, and for regulating Salvage."—Leave was then given to bring in the Bill.

ANNUITIES.

The House, on the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, resolved itself into a Committee, to consider of the resolution, respecting the granting annuities in the public funds, to persons not under the age of 50. Mr. Wharton in the Chair.

The resolutions were severally put and carried, and the report was ordered to be received on Monday.—Adjourned to Monday.

PROVINCIALS.

So great a change in the face of Nature within the last fortnight is perhaps scarcely within the recollection of any man living. At the commencement of this beautifully recorded month, the cold chilling blasts produced a cheerless prospect; at present every meadow is covered with a rich and beautiful verdure; the fruit trees have burst into blossom; and the corn lands, rendered to all appearance sterile, by the severity of a long and dreary winter, have assumed the most luxuriant and promising aspect of a plenteous year.

The season shews fine for large crops of grass, grain, and fruit, &c. all over the country, particularly in Berks, Bucks, Oxfordshire, Hants, and adjoining counties, &c. There is one very fine peach tree in full bloom, and the fruit all well set, in a gentleman's garden at Colnbrooke, which last year produced 130 dozen of fine fruit, and by the gentleman's account of this year's, is very likely to produce three times that quantity.

Manchester, May 25.—In consequence of the rejection of the Bill for fixing the minimum of wages, a very great agitation has been excited amongst the weavers in this town and its vicinity. Yesterday and this day many thousands of them assembled in a field near St. George's Church, by Newton-lane, and appointed delegates to attend the Magistrates with a statement of their grievances, which they assert arose not so much from a scarcity of employment, as from the unparalleled reduction which the prices of their work have recently experienced; insomuch, that, after labouring for six days, at the rate of fourteen or fifteen hours per day, they cannot possibly earn more than seven or eight shillings! a pittance which will not support nature. Their employers, on the contrary, insist that, owing to the stagnation of trade, they cannot afford to pay higher prices, and promise to increase them to their wanted standard as soon as a restoration of peace shall enable them. Be this as it may, a very serious alarm has been excited. The people have this day flocked hither from all the circumjacent townships, viz. Stockport, Bolton, Bury, Oldham, Ashton-under-Line, Eccles, &c. and became so formidable, though certainly at first orderly and quiet, that the military from the Barracks (4th dragoons) were drawn out, and all the Volunteer Corps assembled. The Magistrates repeatedly requested the people to disperse, and used every possible means to appease them; but as they persisted in their right to assemble, and remained unmoved on the field, the Riot Act was at length read, and the soldiery made several apparently furious charges, merely with a view to enforce compliance, at the same time carefully avoiding any serious injury. Notwithstanding this forbearance, however, the mob persisted, and considerable mischief has been done; one man is killed, and many wounded. About twenty persons have likewise been apprehended, and committed to prison. The utmost consternation still (at eight o'clock, p. m.) pervades the town, and every one dreads the result.

TUESDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

Admiralty Office, May 24, 1808.

A letter has been received by the Hon. William Wellesley Pole, from Mr. John Kinsman, commander of the Active Excise cutter, dated at Falmouth, the 19th inst. stating that on the 17th, he had captured in the said cutter, after a chace of some hours, the Deux Freres French privateer of St. Maloes, armed with two carriage guns, and manned with twenty-nine men. She had been out four days, and had taken two vessels, one of which was retaken by the Active, and the other by the Betsy privateer of Plymouth.

DISCOVERIES IN POMPEII AND HERCULANEUM.

The recent Discoveries in Pompeii and Herculaneum, illustrated by Historical Descriptions, Classical Analyses, and highly finished Engravings, will be introduced into every future Number of LE BEAU MONDE; OR, LITERARY AND FASHIONABLE MAGAZINE. The first Plate will represent the TEMPLE OF ISIS, portrayed in the exact situation that it was discovered, by an exquisite Engraving from an original Drawing, designed under the superintendance of the late Sir William Hamilton. An Engraving in the same splendid style will be published in every future Number of the above Magazine, all of which will be engraved from the same authority; and therefore no doubt can be entertained of their accuracy and originality. It may be necessary to observe, that the above will be given in addition to the usual Embellishments of the Magazine. The TWENTY-SECOND NUMBER of the Magazine will be published on WEDNESDAY next, Price Half-a-Crown—it will be conspicuous for its Splendour and Magnificence, and will be the most original and unrivalled Work that has ever been published.

The following is the List of Embellishments, which will be published on WEDNESDAY NEXT:—

1. Portrait of the RIGHT HON. EARL MOIRA.
2. The Temple of Isis, engraved from an Original Drawing, designed under the superintendance of SIR WM. HAMILTON.
3. Characteristic Whole Length Portrait of MR. BANNISTER, as Echo, in the Comedy of The World.
4. Three beautifully coloured Costumes of Ladies and Gentlemen.

The Impressions of the Plates will be delivered in the order they are subscribed for.

Its Literature, among many other interesting Articles, will contain:—The LIFE of the EARL of MOIRA—The ARBITRATOR, No. VIII. on the Evangelical Magazine—On Epic Poetry among the Romans—Advice to Painters—On the Effects of Adversity on different Minds—La Bonne Bouche—Copious Review of Mr. SCOTT'S Marmion—as the fame of Mr. Scott has called the attention of the public in a particular manner to this Work, a considerable number of pages are devoted to it: and the Proprietors have no fear of placing it in competition with that which has appeared in the most celebrated review of the day—Herculaneum and Pompeii—Original Poetry—Public Amusements—Politics—Miscellanies—Le Beau Monde—Memoirs of Mr. BANNISTER, and a masterly Criticism on his general Performance.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

It will be remembered that when, in our Political Disquisition on the affairs of Spain, we took a view of the causes of the Revolutions that have occurred there, we ventured to select, as the most probable of those causes, a principle of action which few of our cotemporaries were willing to consider. We conceived, that though it was by no means improbable that BONAPARTE had by his intrigues set the first Revolution in motion, yet the most likely supposition was, that the people were themselves inclined to revolt, and did so, without foreign investigation. But we all know BONAPARTE so well, that it is no matter of surprise to us, to see him already writing a letter to the PRINCE of ASTURIAS in the style of a Master. We cannot wonder to see him taking instant advantage of commotion, though he may not have originally raised it. Some of the last measures we can scarcely doubt, have been effected by his immediate interposition: and we are amply inclined to believe, that he has intentionally sacrificed some of his troops, for the sake of gaining an excuse for the oppression of Spain, and the ultimate sequestration of all its authority into his own hands.

Dispatches have been received from Admiral PURVIS, which are thought to relate to a proposal from Cadiz, for surrendering the French and Spanish Fleets in that port, the former as prize, and the latter in trust: or for allowing England to occupy Cadiz, which is considered by some to be a post defensible against the Continent. To these dispatches an answer was sent by Ministers on Friday. For the sake of the Spaniards themselves, we hope that no surrender of the ships is likely to be made. It will not enable us to assist them: and it will excite the most signal vengeance of BONAPARTE. As to the occupation of Cadiz, we consider that report as a little too romantic to be believed.

The accounts from Gibraltar by the Townshend packet, just arrived, relate chiefly to the late events in Spain. It is stated, that BONAPARTE had given directions to his troops to strip all the Spanish arsenals, disarm all the inhabitants, and send all the arms and stores to France, and it was in the execution of these orders that the French troops met with that formidable popular resistance, which has been already described; the people, however, appeared to continue unanimous in their determination to resist their oppressors. In Cadiz, the French were compelled to take refuge on board the ships of war lying in the harbour.—The Duke DE MEDINA CELI, with a number of the principal Nobility, and several Archbishops and Bishops, had gone to Bayonne, at the desire of BONAPARTE, and it was supposed they would be retained by him as hostages.

The following letter, by the Townshend packet, gives an account of the late Insurrection at Madrid, somewhat different from those already given:—

"On the 2d inst. General Murat (Grand Duke of Berg), entered Madrid, and intimated to the Infant Don Antonio, that his presence was requisite at the conferences about to be held at Bayonne, between Bonaparte and the King, and that it was expected he would issue a Proclamation declaring him (Murat) Regent during his absence. To this the Infant answered, "That he had received the Regency from the King his Nephew, into whose hands only he would resign it; and, that as the duties of the Regent of Spain were incompatable with a journey to Bayonne, he should remain at Madrid." Murat finding the Infant immoveable in his determination, ordered a large body of troops, which he had a few days before withdrawn from Madrid, to re-enter that city, intending, as is supposed, to seize the person of Don Antonio, and to declare himself Regent. However, the inhabitants got intimation of it, and being alarmed at the return of the French, they collected in the streets, attacked the French army with vigour and resolution, took their cannon, which they turned against them, and drove them out of the town with great slaughter. It is supposed that at least 10,000 persons lost their lives in the conflict. The French force was originally 80,000, and rivulets of blood were running through the streets. When this account came away, the greatest confusion prevailed, but nothing farther had transpired."

The Swedes appear to have been much discouraged by the surrender of Sweabourg, and have amused themselves with many false hopes concerning its safety. However, there appear to be no good grounds for supposing that any accident has prevented it from passing over to the enemy, according to the terms of Admiral CRONSTEDT's capitulation. The KING of SWEDEN has issued a Proclamation to console the people.

The intelligence that we collect from the Swedish papers is of a nature generally favourable. An advantage has been gained by the Swedes, near Revolaz, in Finland, on the 27th of April, when the Russian General BOULATOFF, seven officers, and four hundred men were made prisoners, and a considerable quantity of artillery and arms captured. From another place, however, called Bjorneby, news was brought, that on the 24th of April, Colonel GAHN had been compelled to surrender, with the remains that were left out of a corps of two hundred men, after a gallant conflict against a superior force. General KLINGSPOR, on the 25th of April, drove the enemy from Revolaz with considerable loss. General ARMFELDT had met with some trifling successes: and a slight victory had been gained at Pulkila, by Colonel SANDELS. The KING of SWEDEN has advanced General KLINGSPOR to the dignity of a Field Marshal, and published a Proclamation, exulting in the successes of the Swedish arms.

All this, however, establishes but little. We must wait to hear something concerning the operations of our Expedition, which has safely arrived in the North, before we can form any rational conjecture as to the probable result of the hostilities between Russia and Sweden.

As has long been expected, a rupture has broken out between Russia and the Porte. The arrangements for the partition of that Empire will soon begin to be developed. We have no doubt that the force which France requested to have permission to march through Turkey, for the invasion of India, whatever its ultimate object might be, was destined, in the first instance, for the overthrow of the Divan.

We understand, from authority, that the owner of a transport has received intelligence from the master, dated from the Straits of Gibraltar, stating, that he had arrived at Gibraltar, with the Transit, empty, and was immediately directed to take on board troops, which he did, and joined a fleet of 21 sail of transports bound for Cadiz.

The King and Queen of Spain, the Queen of Etruria, the Infanta, Don Francisco, and the Prince of Peace, are expected at the Palace of Fontainbleau by the 20th of May. The Prince of Asturias will, in a short time, arrive at the estate of Valancy, in the department of Judre, which belongs to his Highness the Grand Elector.

Admiral Gantheaume has succeeded in victualling Corfu with provisions for two years. The magazines have also been stocked with a large quantity of powder, ball, and ammunition of all kinds, and the garrisons of the Seven Islands have been reinforced with several thousand troops.

The Swedish Commander at Sweaborg gave up to the enemy a spirited and numerous garrison, and a flottilla of 180 sail! Among these were many galleys carrying between 24 and 30 guns, and fitted up for the navigation of the shallow parts of the Baltic. These vessels, when well manned, are extremely formidable; in calm weather they are dangerous even to ships of the line, laying comparatively low in the water, almost every shot from them tells on their lofty oponent, while the fire of the larger ship flies, as it were, over their heads. It is in this way that the Spanish gun-boats have proved so destructive to British merchantmen, and so troublesome to British ships of war. Such is the force which Admiral Cronstedt has made over to the invaders of his country.

It is a most painful and melancholy spectacle to behold the profligacy of the town, and in no street is it more apparent that in Catherine-street, Strand, in which there is a house of notorious ill fame. The disgusting scenes that are daily exhibited at the doors of the house alluded to, are horrid indeed. In the middle of the day, even the most depraved scenes are constantly to be witnessed.—If the Magistrates of Bow-street cannot have house shut up, they would do well to place an officer before the house, to prevent, at least, the inhabitants from being disgusted with the depravity of the Fountain of vice.

A gentleman, who was going to the masquerade in Dublin, on Monday se'nnight, in the character of a piper, was stopped by the populace near Carlisle-bridge, to whom he very politely exhibited himself, and, in the spirit of his character, played them a tune on his bagpipes, which they were so well pleased with, that a party of coal-porters and flour-porters, who ply in that neighbourhood, insisted on taking him into a house on Aston's-quay, where they made him play for them until four o'clock in the morning; when, falling out among themselves, and having got drunk, they broke his bagpipes and piper's mask, and being thus treated with "piper's wages," he retired to rest without the enjoyment of a ball or supper, for which he had purchased a ticket of admission.

Bullock, the bankrupt, whose case was reported the other day by the Recorder, and who was then respited, has received his Majesty's pardon, upon condition of his being transported to New South Wales for life.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday, at twelve o'clock, His Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace, from Windsor, and after partaking of an early dinner, held a private Levee, which was attended as usual.

The following had the honour of being introduced to His Majesty, upon their promotion, &c.

The Earl of Conyngham, upon his being appointed Major-General. Capt. Dillon of the Royal Navy, upon his promotion, by Lord Mulgrave, in consequence of an action he had off the coast of Norway, with a Danish man of war of superior force. The Earl of Camden, upon his being appointed Lord Lieutenant of the County of Kent, in the room of the Earl of Romney, resigned. Mr. Adair, by Mr. Canning, upon his return from his Embassy at the Court of Vienna.

His Majesty held a Privy Council, at which Earl Camden was sworn in Lord Lieutenant of the County of Kent, and about seven o'clock he set off on his return to Windsor.

On Saturday se'nnight, the four-in-hand Club, consisting of seven open barouches, with two servants in the rear dickey of each, went in procession down to Epsom, in order to inspect some favourite horses that were to start at the races! These distinguished amateurs of the whip dined together at the Sprea. Eagle, and having wet their whistles in the true Jehu style, the set off for town, when some curious manœuvres of coachmanship were displayed, in one of which the hind wheels of Mr. B——'s vehicle were canted into a ditch; after which, however, the whole cavalcade returned over Westminster-bridge, with only one broken knee, and two cracked pannels. Lord S——— declined joining in this exhibition.

FASHIONABLE ELOPEMENT.

The subject of this unhappy affair is still the prevailing topic in the higher circles, and a variety of stories are in circulation. The Lady seems as much the object of pity as of censure, if it be true that she gave her hand at the altar with great reluctance, not on account of an attachment to any individual, but because she was wholly indifferent to the bridegroom. What heightens the sentiment of compassion in her favour is, the report that the husband was known to have a Lady under his protection, from whom he had absolutely refused to separate. It is wonderful that a marriage should have taken place under such inauspicious circumstances, and though nothing can justify the dishonourable course which the Lady has adopted, yet these circumstances, if truly stated, will but too well account for the unfortunate consequences which have arisen. Another consideration which operates in behalf of the Lady is, the unfortunate fate that most probably awaits her from the inconstancy imputed to her gallant, who, it is confidently predicted, will be satiated in a short time, and will "cast her like a loathsome weed, away."

Among other rumours, it is said that the Lady, very shortly after her marriage, found a letter from the fair idol of her husband, and an intended answer, full of the tenderest expressions. The wife hastened to her Noble Father, who advised her to return to her husband, and wait with patience for a happier period. This remedy, however, did not seem so efficacious as that suggested by the gallant, and unhappily she adopted the latter.

The retreat of the fugitives is said to have been discovered by an intercepted letter sent to the discarded waiting maid, telling her where to go, as her dimission was only a temporary expedient. The maid, in agitation and alarm, carried the letter to the wife's father, but he positively declined to take any part in the unhappy affair. The abode of the Lovers is said to be in the vicinity of Portman-square.

It is impossible to describe the unhappiness that prevails among the friends and relations of all parties, and there can be little doubt that the misguided fair will too soon endure her full portion of the misery that her fatal error has occasioned.

CITY.

Tuesday, a Court of Aldermen was held at Guildhall, which was attended by the Lord Mayor and fourteen Aldermen.

BREAD.—The Court ordered the price of bread to remain the same as before, viz. 11½*d.* the quartern loaf of wheaten, and 10*d.* household.

The Lord Mayor laid before the Court a Letter he received from the Lords of the Admiralty, announcing the discharge of Horatio Houlgate, a Freeman and Liveryman, who was impressed, which was read.

The Lord Mayor laid before the Court Letters he had received from Thomas Rowcroft and Richard Lea, Esqrs. Aldermen of the Wards of Walbrook and Coleman-street, requesting leave to resign their Gowns, which was agreed to, and the Lord Mayor was requested to issue his Precepts for the election of others in their room.

John Cowley, Thomas Poynder, Thomas Whipham, and Martin Pearkes, Esqrs. have paid each their fines of 400*l.* and 20 marks, to be excused serving the Office of Sheriff.

THE LOAN.

Friday, the Bidders of the Loan had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Foster, and Mr. Huskisson were also present. Mr. Perceval informed the Gentlemen, that the sum of eight millions would be wanted for England, and two millions and a half for Ireland; that he left it to the option of the Contractors to say, whether the bidding should take place in the 3 per Cent. Consols, redeemable at 80, in the 4 per Cent. Consols, or in both jointly. The Gentlemen declared, without hesitation, that as the 3 per Cents. were to be redeemable at 80, they would prefer making the bidding in the 4 per Cent. Consols alone, which was agreed to. The Chancellor of the Exchequer signified, that 1,200,000*l.* was to be borrowed of the Bank of Ireland, at 5 per cent. and it was also his intention to raise 750,000*l* in Ireland, by open loan; besides that, there would be a vote of credit in Exchequer Bills, 4,500,000*l.* to replace the like sum of last year, and 1,500,000*l.* raised by Exchequer Bills to pay the East India Company. The bidding is to take place on Tuesday next. The Lists are as follow:

Walsh and Nesbit; Smith, Payne, and Co. Wright and Cat; Herries and Co.; Gordon and Murphy; Boldero and Harper;

Bosanquet and Co. Messrs. Goldsmids. Robards, Curtis, and Co.; Thellusson, Brothers, and Co.; George Ward. John Barnes, David Ricardo, and C. and J. Steers. Baring, Brothers, and Co.; Battye; J. J. Angerstein; Ellis; Ayton. Four per Cent. discount to be allowed as usual. The period of payments as under:—

June 3	£10	Oct. 14	£15
July 15	15	Nov. 18	10
August 19	15	Dec. 16	10

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

On Thursday evening Miss Pope took her final leave of the Public. Having played for the only time the character of Deborah Dowlas, Lady Duberly, in Mr. Colman's diverting comedy of The Heir at Law, she stepped forward as Audrey, to deliver a farewell address. Whether it was her philosophy, or the wretched poetry of the address, that kept down her feelings, we are not able exactly to determine; but certainly she made her last exit with as much firmness as an Indian ever exhibited at the moment of death. Perhaps a little weakness on this occasion would have been more amiable: but we cannot blame Miss Pope for her indifference. Of the individuals in the house, for whom she had a private friendship, she was not about to take a final leave; it was the public only that she was to part from. And what mighty services have the public ever done to the actors, for which the actors should be grateful to the public? If the spectators like a performance, they applaud it; if they are displeased, they hiss it: they pay so much money for a certain commodity, and the matter is as much an affair of bargain and sale, as any transaction between man and man. The obligation, if there be any, is certainly mutual. The actors are obliged to the public for their maintenance, and so are men in all other professions and trades: the public are obliged to the actors for their pleasure, and if they were not better pleased by going to the play than by staying at home, they would not go. The public have been truly called by the poets, a many headed monster. They are easily offended, but with difficulty pleased: they have feelings as individuals, but they have no feeling as a body.

Miss Pope was an actress of repute at a very early age, and Churchill has spoken of her merits in his Rosciad:

"With all the native vigour of sixteen,
"Among the merry groupe conspicuous seen,
"See lively Pope advance in jig and trip,
"Corinna, Cherry, Honeycomb, and Snip.
"Not without art, but yet to nature true,
"She charms the town with humour just, yet new."

In our times Miss Pope has not ventured on the youthful performances which the poet commemorates: but we can have no doubt, from the concurring testimony of those who recollect her earlier efforts, that she was an actress well deserving the encomium here bestowed.

Her peculiar merit, ever since we can recollect her acting, has been the expression of pertness; whether the low pertness of Mrs. Heidelberg, in The Clandestine Marriage, the lady like pertness of Mrs. Candour, in The School for Scandal, or the half genteel and half vulgar pertness of Flippanta, in The Confederacy. When Churchill said she was true to nature, he spoke of a girl; but it has been the praise of Miss Pope to continue at sixty as natural as she is described to have been at sixteen. And it must be observed that her delineation of nature was natural, because it was exquisitely assisted by art: for of all the actresses we ever remember to have seen, Miss Pope appears to have possessed in the most eminent degree the knowledge of effects and the practice of the stage: and Churchill would perhaps have spoken more accurately if he had said,

"Not without art, and thus to nature true."

Art, when it does not improve nature, is not so properly art, as pedantry: its use is to adorn nature, not disguise her. If this excellent kind of art, which is founded upon a knowledge of principles, were a little more universal in this country, we should not hear, amid the abundance of comic talent that we possess, a perpetual superiority allowed to the comic acting of the French. It is not that they have more capability than we, but that they improve their capability better. When we succeed, we commonly succeed by chance; they succeed always, because they proceed upon principle.

COVENT-GARDEN.

A new comedy, called, Match-making, or, It's a wise Child that knows its own Father, was performed for the first time on Tuesday last. We have not room to enter minutely into the details of this very amusing piece: but we have no hesitation in speaking of it in general with lively panegyric. It must be observed, indeed, that this comedy has rather too much plot, a fault not very usual with the plays that have lately been exhibited: not that the fable becomes confused by its own weight, but that there are two serious interests in the comedy, and one is in fact enough. There is a good deal of new character; and the dialogue is exceedingly sprightly and laughable, containing much excellent satire on fashionable manners, the Newspapers, and other subjects, peculiarly well selected for the lash of legitimate comedy. Perhaps we shall give to this piece the highest praise, by declaring, that though it constantly amuses, it is a comedy, and not a five act farce. Mr. Liston's acting deserves to be particularly commended. He acted a modern fine gentleman: and his lounging conceit was of a nature most entertaining, if possible, than his manner in The Widow's Choice.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East-India House, when Capt. Jamieson was sworn into the command of the General Stuart, destined to Madras and Bengal.—The Court adjourned till Wednesday next.

The following ships, outward-bound, arrived off Madeira, the 28th April last, under convoy of the Thetis, viz. Europe, William Pitt, Lord Castlereagh, Sovereign, Lord Keith, Sir William Bensley, Euphrates, Northumberland, and Alexander. The seven first mentioned ships parted from the Northumberland and Alexander on the 28th April, and proceeded on their voyages; and on the 30th April the Northumberland and Alexander went into Madeira, and were expected to sail from thence the 15th May.

DINNER OF THE WESTMINSTER ELECTORS.

Monday the Electors of Westminster met at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, in the Strand, to celebrate the anniversary of the Election of Sir Francis Burdett, Bart. as one of their Representatives in Parliament, which the dinner tickets designated as "the Triumph of Westminster, or the Purity of Election." Sir Francis took his seat at the head of the table. On his right and left sat Mr. Byng, the Member for Middlesex, Major Cartwright, Colonel Wardell, Messrs. Sturch, Richter, Adams, and the rest of the Election Committee. A band of music was placed in the orchestra, and the great room of the Tavern was completely filled.

After the cloth was removed, and several toasts had been drank, Sir Francis Burdett addressed the Electors to the following effect:—

Gentlemen, I find difficulty in expressing to you my sense of the honor you have this day done me, but more particularly I experience a difficulty in expressing my sense of the honor you have done yourselves. If any thing could afford a glimpse of hope to my mind, in the present melancholy condition of the country, it would be the spirited conduct of the Electors themselves, rather than any return I can make for the honor they have conferred upon me. Yet as far as a steady and inflexible adherence to the principles that first recommended me to your notice, can compensate the hope you have placed in me, so far I can pledge myself to a faithful return.—(A cry of bravo!—it is all we want.)—I am well aware that any little weight I may have obtained with the country, is that which emanates from the Electors of Westminster, rather than from my own intrinsic merits. To speak the voice of my Constituents, and to represent their feelings and interests, will be my first object and chief duty of my life. Yet I am not prepared to say that it will be of much use, as a single voice can be of little effect with the majority. But this I am prepared to say, that let our present dangers be external or internal, nothing in my mind can produce any rational hope in effectually warding off the dangers that threaten the land, unless it is in checking internal corruption, which I presume to be the only real source of external danger. I need not say, by checking internal corruption, that I mean a reform in the representation of the people. It is childish to suppose that a representation, out of which one hundred and fifty Peers and powerful personages return whom they think proper to Parliament, can be looked up to for a redress of grievances. I have therefore no hesitation in saying, that a reform in the Representation of the Commons House of Parliament is as necessary to the real defence of the country as arms and men (loud applauses). There are persons who speak the language of the people to flatter and support the Court Party, and hold out minor points of reform to mislead the public: yet no other spirit prevails with them than to heap additional burthens upon the people. You have had Commissioners appointed to correct public abuses; but no public plunderer has been brought to justice—no saving made in the public expenditure. On the contrary, additional charges have been made to provide for the encreased expence of those Commissioners of Enquiry.—There are those in the country who have compared persons in power to leeches. This comparison, in my opinion is extremely erroneous—as leeches, when sated and full, will fall off; but the rulers of the present day are insatiable—the more they get the more they desire; and the people have the melancholy reflection, that they never drop off or suck less hard. (Applauses.) In proposing a redress of grievances, and the correction of abuses, there are those who will always try, it is not the time in difficulty, distress, and war, to agitate such questions: now I say that such is peculiarly the time: for what would be thought of a Captain of a ship of war, who was ordered to clear for action, if he should say, leave all things in confusion till the action is over—(applause.)—The argument of those who say that the present is not the period for reform, is in the same way; the liberties of the people, and the freedom of the country, is endangered and threatened with annihilation; and, I say, unless these are restored, the country must eventually be lost: and if you would save the country, make that country worth defending—(loud applause)—make the people feel they have something worth defending, and they will willingly unite in its defence, but do not let them be deluded by mock parties. A reform of abuses is to the Constitution what the soul is to the body; effect it, and the soul and body of the land will unite. It must be effected to make the country secure. We have seen mercenary states sink beneath foreign subjugation, rather than defend their own rights: and the people of England, since they have no chance of being saved by their Ministers, should think of saving themselves.—(Reiterated applause.)—But unless the spirit is felt by the people generally, the patriot few can produce no radical benefit. Therefore, gratified even as I am, by the exertions of the Electors of Westminster, I should be deceiving them were I not to thus publicly assert, that one voice in the aggregate number that compose the House of Commons can be of little or no avail. We have frequently been told of domestic enemies, and I will give the people an infallible rule of knowing those enemies. We do not usually plunder our friends, therefore those who get the plunder are the enemies spoken of; and in future, instead of asking who is the Minister, let the people ask where is the plunderer? and where he is, there is the enemy also.—(Applauses from all parts of the room.)

"It is to get rid of that enemy all my efforts are and shall be directed. The present sessions has added much to the burthens of the people—nothing to their liberties: and here I have to apologise for sitting in the House, and suffering acts to pass without my opposition, that entrench upon the liberties of the subject; but one's body must be made of iron, and one's mind quick as lightning, to attend and understand the multifarious business that passes.—I take shame to myself that I should not have opposed the Indictment Bill, as it affects the rights and liberties of the people. But there is another Bill (I mean the Local Militia Bill) that I pledge myself to oppose, and I hope it will not pass into a law, at least without reprobation; for I also trust that the people of this country are not yet so degenerate and subservient, to submit to this last of human degradations. Ministers having broken down the spirit of the people by taxation, now seek to take their persons by force.—(General bursts of applause)—I shall conclude with requesting the Electors to bear in mind, that there is one measure more that can effectually relieve the People—I mean a Reform in the Representation of the People; all other minor expedients are trifling and nugatory.—A Reform in Parliament is the master-key—it would tend to destroy peculators, and introduce that economy which is best calculated to secure the country. The want of that reform is the source that poisons the stream that England drinks; it is the cause of all our present evil—it is the cause of the present calamitous war—and will be the final cause, if not prevented, of the eventual subjugation of the country."

Sir F. Burdett also pledged himself to take the sense of the House upon the question whether the Admiralty Droits belonged to the Crown or the People. Parliament might decide the question as they pleased, but he would demand the decision on the part of the public. (This speech was followed by a tumult of applause.) Sir Francis retired about ten o'clock, and the remainder of the evening was spent in the utmost harmony.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

CAPTAIN BETTESWORTH.—The Tartar frigate, belonging to the squadron under the command of Admiral Vashon, at Leith, returned to that anchorage on the evening of the 20th, after having sustained a very gallant action off Bergen. It appears that the frigate was lying off that place on the 16th inst. watching the motions of some Danish vessels, when it was deemed possible to cut some of them out by means of the ship's boats. They accordingly proceeded, under the direction of Mr. Sykes, the First-Lieutenant, when four Danish gun-boats and a schooner made a sudden and unexpected attack upon her. The action continued upwards of an hour, during which time Lieutenant Sykes succeeded in capturing one of the boats, but was obliged to relinquish his prize. By the very first shot the Captain was unfortunately killed, while in the act of firing off one of the guns. Mr. Fitzhugh, a Midshipman, and several of the crew, were also slain. The enemy, however, had reason to repent of their attack, for one of their vessels was sunk, and the remainder dispersed, having sustained considerable damage. The loss of the enemy is supposed to be great in killed and wounded. Captain Bettesworth was lately married to Lady Hannah Grey, sister to Earl Grey, and had just fitted out this frigate, in which he has so prematurely lost his valuable life.—Aged 28 years.

Dispatches were on Tuesday received at the Admiralty from Lord Collingwood, dated off Sicily, the 26th of April. The Rochefort and Toulon squadrons continued blockaded in the latter port, and the Carthagena squadron was closely watched at Port Mahon. General Sir J. Stuart had arrived at Palermo, and taken the command of the troops in Sicily.

By a vessel arrived at Plymouth, from the Havannah, intelligence is received that his Majesty's ship Muros, of 22 guns, Capt. Duff, struck on the Callonedos Rocks, on the Island of Cuba, on the 5th ult. from which situation it was found impracticable to get her off, and she was set on fire, but did not blow up. The officers and crew were all saved.

Brooke and Co. 237, Piccadilly, respectfully inform the Public, that the ensuing State Lottery consists of only 25,000 Tickets, and is the only Lottery that ever contained six Prizes of 20,000*l.* two of 10,000*l.* two of 5000*l.* three of 2000*l.* and five of 1000*l.* besides an equal number of other Prizes to any former Lottery; these are objects of attraction beyond any thing of the kind, since the commencement of Lotteries, and they recommend the Public to purchase immediately. Brooke and Co.'s Office has been established 60 years, and has been particularly fortunate in selling Capital Prizes. In the Lottery just finished, 24,206 and 24,209, both prizes of 500*l.* were sold in Shares.

In the Grand and Last State Lottery for 1807, which begins Drawing the 28th of June, 1808, behold the following Capital Prizes, all floating! namely, six of 20,000*l.* two of 10,000*l.* two of 5,000*l.* three of 2,000*l.* five of 1,000*l.* seven of 500*l.* and only 25,000 Tickets. For such Capitals, buy Ticket or Shares of Sir James Branscomb and Co. at their Temple of Good Fortune, No. 11, Holborn, 37, Cornhill, or 38, Haymarket; where, in the last State Lottery were sold, in 162 Shares, the following Capitals:—Nos. 14,223, a Prize of 20,000*l.*; 12,909, 10,000*l.*; 10,276, 1,000*l.*; 12,862, 1,000*l.*; 5,800, 1,000*l.*; 12,197, 1,000*l.*; 18,200, 500*l.*; 1,814, 500*l.*; 3,744, 500*l.*; 5,798, 500*l.*; 22,230, 500*l.*; 17,949, 500*l.* &c. &c. Likewise, No. 2,570, the only grand 40,000*l.* prize ever known, was sold at the above Offices, in 16 Sixteenths, in the preceding Lottery.

BIRTH.

On Thursday, the 5th instant, at the Poor-house, in Stoke-upon Trent, Hannah Bourne, a deformed dwarf, measuring only 25 inches in height, was, after a very tedious and difficult labour, safely delivered of a female child of the ordinary size, measuring 21½ inches, being only three inches and a half shorter than the mother.—The child was in every respect perfect, but still born; the mother, contrary to expectation, is likely to do well. This very singular instance furnishes the Medical World with an extraordinary case, that will throw some additional light on the obstetric art.

MARRIED.

On Saturday, at St. Pancras Church, by the Rev. Arthur Bold, Vicar of Stoke, near Windsor, John Howell, Esq. of Carmarthen, M.P. to Miss Morgan, daughter of Mrs. Reader, of Brunswick-square.

DIED.

On Tuesday last, at Seaton Delaval, Northumberland, the Right Hon. John Lord Delaval, at an advanced age. His Lordship is succeeded in his estates, which are very large, in Northumberland, Lincolnshire, and Yorkshire, by Sir John Astley, Member for Yorkshire.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER TWENTY-THREE.

ON THE CATHOLIC PETITION, AND ITS RECEPTION.

Whenever the rulers of this nation have occasion to make a demand upon the people, it is their custom to exclaim, that the British Empire is placed in a situation of unprecedented peril, and that it behoves all classes of men to make sacrifices for the defence of their country. But if the times in which we live, be indeed times of difficulty and danger, which we are sorry to confess is the case, does it not become necessary for the Government to take all the possible means of surmounting its difficulties, and obviating its dangers, of increasing rather than diminishing its natural strength, and conciliating rather than disgusting the minds of the people at large? Yet at this period of acknowledged calamity, Great Britain is content to deprive of their natural rights, four millions of men, the natives of one of her islands, the subjects of her Government—men who might be an army fighting her battles, but whom she is exasperating to be an army arrayed against her existence. The old watch-word still rings in our ears, "Britain must exert herself to weather the "storm." And how does Britain make her exertions? Why by venturing to swim on this tempestuous ocean with one of her limbs bound uselessly to her side. Her Roman Catholic subjects, a fifth of her whole population, are excluded from the common interests of Britons. And why? for a crime? No; but because, three hundred years ago, Roman Catholic councils have passed ecclesiastical decrees, repugnant to the spirit of the mode of worship now established in Great Britain.

There are some persons who admit the value of the assistance that such a population may afford, but who expect that this population will afford its assistance without previous motive or subsequent reward. These are not the principles of human nature. No man will serve another, unless from attachment in the first instance, or from the hope of recompence after the service is performed. The Irish have now neither attachment nor hope to engage them in our service. So far from entertaining attachment to us, they have been long nourishing discontents of a very alarming description: discontents which it is the imperious duty of our Government to allay. This is an argument that always terrifies the antagonists of Catholic Emancipation: and they seek consolation from their fears in arguments by no means consistent with each other. Sometimes they deny that any great discontent does exist among the Roman Catholics of Ireland in general. But if no great discontent does exist among the Roman Catholics of Ireland in general, why have rebellions deluged that unfortunate country for twelve years past with the blood of her children? Why is a military force maintained there, and why has military law been enforced? Why have the foes of Catholic Emancipation so constantly employed, as one of their arguments, a declamation on the disaffected spirit which they assert to be inherent in the Popish profession? It is but too plain that discontent does exist; and it is equally plain that this discontent should be allayed. Since attachment has been stifled in the bosoms of the Irish, it becomes necessary that we endeavour to conciliate them by hope. But the opposers of their claims contend, that their discontent is unreasonable, and would not be stilled by the measures proposed. Unreasonable, the discontent of freemen deprived of the rights of freedom! Unreasonable, the discontent of brothers defrauded of the heritage of nature! If these be unreasonable discontents, then where is the reasonableness of the boasts that the happier members of the community are so constantly uttering about their own invaluable freedom, and their own unrivalled constitution? But it is said that the concession of the immunities now solicited would not allay these discontents. If indeed the want of these immunities be not a reasonable cause for discontent, the concession of these immunities will not perhaps be an adequate cure for discontent: but we think that we can easily prove the alleged causes of uneasiness to be fully adequate to the effects that we see in some mode or other existing among the Irish Catholics. There are people who say, "Oh, it is impossible that the "poor people, the peasants, and the mechanics, should "expose themselves to the dangers of rebellion, merely for "the sake of procuring to two or three hundred rich men, "the chance of seats in Parliament, or of certain high "offices in the civil and military departments. And then "so few persons at any rate would be able to gain "these great offices, that the difference would never be "sensibly discerned even by the higher orders of people." It must be observed that most of the prohibited offices are offices of high dignity. The people of consequence who would aspire to these offices have a weight which makes their mortifications become a matter of general interest in society: their relatives, their friends, their tenants, their dependents, down to the lowest ranks of the state, are influenced by the temper of their chief, and moved perhaps more violently than himself, inasmuch as their understandings are less cultivated. They have a pride in the dignity of their leader: they have a mortification in his discredit: the cause of the chief is the cause of the party: and that power which is felt to operate upon the great, operates downward, even to the remotest individual who stands linked in the order of society. The stone that falls upon the water, not only makes a ring round the little spot where it drops, but extends the undulation of the surface in a hundred circles, one beyond another, each wider than those which have preceded it.

But the middling classes of society feel the operation of the existing disabilities, not merely through the medium of their superiors, but as that operation directly affects themselves. For though the numbers of those Catholics who actually stand so high, as to knock at the gate and hear their admission refused, be actually very inconsiderable, yet the exclusion is considered a grievance by all those who hope at any future time to attain high situations. What parent can send his son to the bar, without hoping to see him a judge? and yet there can be but twelve judges. What spirited youth ever entered the navy, without hoping to become an admiral? and yet there are few admirals. What ensign ever waved a pair of colours, without the hope of advancing to the staff? and yet there are but few generals. To all such persons, therefore, the exclusion of Catholics to great offices becomes necessarily a matter of complaint: and though the hopes of nine hundred and ninety-nine aspiring minds in a thousand must necessarily be blighted at last, yet those hopes, as long as they endure, sustain the vigour of the human frame amidst all its adversities, and are the cheap reward which the country bestows upon her servants. Destroy the possibility of success, and hope of course must wither: but allow the existence of the possibility, even in the remotest degree, and a thousand exertions will be made to obtain the prize which only one can ultimately gain. Our statesmen and legislators, who for the most are the sons of noblemen, bred in affluence, and placed without their own exertion in the high road of honour, little know the influence of proud hopes in bearing up those souls on which poverty sits with a heavy oppression, and whose wings are clogged by unfavourable connexions. Many and many a youthful mind, expanded by education to a painful consciousness of its own strength, and opposed by obstacles that sicken the sense as they rise, overcomes its impediments by continued vigour, and though death or misfortune at length cut off the wished reward, yet have triumphed as far as they have gone, and assisted to exalt their country, by their struggles for their own exaltation. But a Catholic, born amid adversity, has no motive for contending against it. Honour is not permitted to the reveries of his fancy: or if it ever become a portion of his hopes, it is hoped only when revolution shall have cleared the way for his advancement. When he can gain nothing by the existing frame of things, is it not too natural that he should wish to change that frame?

Nay, the very lowest ranks of the state have a direct, as well as an intermediate motive for murmuring against the exclusions under which they labour. It is natural for them to conceive, that their situation, which at present is in many instances deplorable almost beyond belief, would be amended if persons of their own religious faith were admitted to the two houses of parliament, to the bench, to the magistracy, to the army, and to the navy. At any rate, even the mass of the people must feel that the condition of the whole body would be more honourable; for this principle of honour, though it is often stifled by fashion and by habit, and by the proffigacy of civilized society, does in fact exist often most powerfully among men who, from the humility of their situation, would hardly be supposed capable of so refined a sentiment. Though the niceties of personal honour are not often found except in polished and courtly company, yet this kind of honour, this broad principle of party pride, which in higher circles is generally subordinate to selfish views, glows among humbler individuals, in all the fervour of nature, and with a fierceness which it is dangerous to resist. And perhaps of all the nations of the world, the Irish are generally the most tenacious of what they call their honour, whether real or imaginary. Any insult to that honour, is an injury which they resent: and we beseech our country to redress her injustice, before rebellion become necessary resistance, and massacre be again called self-defence. The Catholics are by the Legislature designated as obnoxious persons: is it to be wondered at if they suffer materially from individual insult? An excellent author, in treating this subject, has said: "When any order "of men is directly degraded by the law, and placed, "though in matters of inconsiderable moment, in a contemptible or humiliated position, the consequence infallibly will be, that they will become objects of contempt "and distrust in all things, and will be subjected to the "insults and oppressions of those who are placed above "them. The multitude of men are naturally disposed to domineer and insult their inferiors. If the law gives "them this licence in any degree, they are sure to abuse "it; if it countenance their insolence in any thing, it will "be unable to check it in any other: and the sanction "which it affords to a certain measure of oppression, will be "made the warrant and pretext for unmeasured usurpation. "In all cases, indeed, of inequality of conditions, the "laws only lay the foundation on which usage erects the "superstructure; they set the example, on which practice "improves, and only give the first local impulse to that "vast undulation which embraces the whole expanse of "society."

It seems then to be tolerably clear, that the insult and oppression which the Irish Catholics suffer, are caused by the degradation to which they are condemned by the legislature: and that this degradation, this insult, and this oppression, united, are the causes of the discontents which prevail among the Irish. But the effect, in all probability, must be destroyed by the destruction of the cause: so that if we put an end to the disgraceful inferiority which has been stamped by the Government on the unfortunate Catholics, we shall probably put an end also to the insults and oppressions which that inferiority superinduces, and the Catholics, like the rest of his Majesty's subjects, will have no misfortunes to lament, but the evils incident alike to all human nature, those evils which Providence may be pleased to inflict upon them. When the laws that are the root of Catholic displeasure shall have been plucked up, Catholic displeasure must fade and die. If the Catholics had never been held forth to vulgar prejudice, by legal exclusions and disabilities, they never would have been invidiously distinguished from the other subjects of Great Britain: and the invidious distinction itself must surely cease, when Catholics shall be pronounced by the Government to be trustworthy persons: when they shall be seen in the senate, on the bench, and in the army: when their noblemen shall share the honours which the Sovereign bestows on other peers: and when their merchants and their country gentlemen, by obtaining situations in corporate bodies, and exercising the functions of the magistracy, shall acquire that influence which every man of fortune and respectability is entitled by the customs of these kingdoms to possess.

In our next Number we shall speak more largely and definitely of the dangers that are to be apprehended from a continuation of the existing laws.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XXIII.

COBBETT'S WEEKLY POLITICAL REGISTER.

Mr. Cobbett, in The Political Register of the 21st of May, speaks at large of the application made by Sir Francis Burdett to the House of Commons on the subject of the Westminster Election, an application concerning which we have already delivered our sentiments at considerable length. But in the course of that article Mr. Cobbett takes occasion to inculcate some of those apparently just and reasonable principles which are so much the fashion in the Junto to which he belongs: and as those principles to us appear as flimsy and futile after due consideration as they appear admissible and even laudable at first sight, we shall devote as much room as we can spare, to the refutation of an author whose theories are fit for no place less pure than Utopia, but whose style of inculcating those theories is suited generally to nothing above the fish-market or the hustings. In many of his writings he exhibits, dramatic-like, a vulgar and dirty strength: but in the article to which we now allude, he gives us, not as usual, powerful arguments cunningly conveyed, but a string of false premises and illogical conclusions, recommending in practice what is utterly impracticable, and preaching a purity in politics which will never be attained while every thing else is impure. In the present state of society the fanciful dreams of Mr. Cobbett cannot be realised. Where purity becomes possible, by all means let purity be preached; but in these times political disinterestedness would be of little use: and to propose it is but to cheapen the decayed garment with a patch which the tatters are not strong enough to hold together.

Mr. Cobbett, in panegyrizing the Electors of Westminster, makes use of the following sentences:—

"The Electors of Westminster want no pay for voting; they "do not desire to thrive by the distresses and miseries of the "nation at large: they desire representatives who will seek no "emolument from the national purse: and of course they desire "that those representatives should be loaded with no burden "but merely that of the duties imposed upon them.—Surely "nothing was ever more reasonable than this."

Now really we think that nothing was ever more unreasonable. The Electors of Westminster, of course, like all other independent Electors, expect a man that will perform all his duties fully, and they expect him, it seems, to perform them for nothing. Justice Blackstone in the Introduction to his Commentaries on the Laws of England, has most justly said, concerning the careful education necessary for a Member of Parliament: "It is really amazing that there should be no other state "of life, no other occupation, art, or science, in which some "method of instruction is not looked upon as requisite, except "only the science of legislation, the noblest and most difficult "of any. Apprenticeships are held necessary to almost every "art, commercial or mechanical: a long course of reading and "study must form the divine, the physician, and the practical "professor of the laws: but every man of superior fortune "thinks himself born a legislator. Yet Tully was of a different "opinion: It is necessary, says he, for a senator to be "thoroughly acquainted with the Constitution: and this, he "declares is a knowledge of the most extensive nature: a matter of science, of diligence, of reflexion: without which no "senator can possibly be fit for his office."

A knowledge of this kind it requires many years to attain: and during those years the expences not only of attaining the knowledge, but also of actual maintenance, must necessarily amount to a considerable sum. When a sufficient knowledge has been attained, and the senator is in every way fitted for discharging his duty as a representative of the people, his whole time, during the session of Parliament, must needs be devoted to the interests of his constituents and of the country at large: and when he has devoted the whole of his time, he will not have been able to study half the measures that pass through the house. And what is the motive that must induce him to take all these pains? Why, a love of his country. But who are the people that constitute a man's country? Certainly his family and his friends. They are the ties that bind him to his native soil: for man has not the attribute which natural philosophers ascribe to is seen in the cat, that attaches herself not so much to the persons who have reared her, as to the place in which she was lived. A man's country then are his family and friends: for himself and for them it is his duty to exert his talents: and when every man does (honestly) that which is best for himself, his family, and his friends, every man will have done the best possible service to his country. John Nokes and Thomas Stiles and several millions of other Johns, and Marys, and Thomasses, and Elizabeths, are of no sort of consequence to any individual unconnected with them: they have no peculiar claim upon his services, merely because they happen to be born only fifty or a hundred miles from his residence. But how is a man to do good to his country, or in other words to provide honestly for himself, his family, and his friends, if he is to receive no reward for his public works? It is certainly necessary that there be persons who will provide for the public at large: but will any body do this out of attachment to the public at large? Certainly not—he would be doing an injury instead of a benefit to his country, if he were to devote his time to public business, when he ought to be maintaining himself, and his family, and his friends.

There is no one who would not laugh if it were proposed to him to devote his whole time, or even a few years of his life, without hope of recompence, to the service of any individual whom he had never seen. Then why should any body devote the same period to the service of many individuals whom he has never seen, constituting what is called the public? In our opinion, a Member of Parliament who takes an active part in the affairs of the public, has a right to receive emolument from the public. For surely he who is delegated to fight a nation's battles as a soldier, does not more amply deserve his remuneration, than he who is delegated to guard her interests in the senate. What have the public ever done for me, in return of which I am expected to do so much for the public? Will it be said that they have given me protection and freedom? Certainly they have: but is not every individual entitled to protection and freedom, who pays his contributions, holds himself subject to levies, and performs all the private duties that individuals owe to the State? Does it follow, that because any one man may happen to be gifted with talents particularly formed for the service of the State, therefore he is bound to employ those talents gratuitously for the State? If that were the case, his talents would be a misfortune to him rather than a blessing, for they would prevent him from maintaining himself.

But perhaps it will be urged that none but rich men, who can afford the time, ought to be Members of Parliament. What? will you select the representatives of the poor exclusively from the rich? Then the democratic branch of your Government becomes an aristocracy.

Besides, even among the rich, no man would serve the public for nothing. If he did not want money as his reward, he would expect honour: and even that, Mr. Cobbett, in the zeal of pure patriotism, wishes to withhold from the benefactors of the State; for after declaiming upon the misfortunes that must accrue to the country from the corruption of Parliament, he draws to a conclusion by declaring:

"Some may prefer baubles to hard solid cash: but the effect, "as to the nation, will be pretty nearly the same in the end."

Is Mr. Cobbett as ignorant of human nature as he boasts himself to be of the learned languages? For he actually seems to think that men will make great efforts without a motive. But those who have studied mankind most deeply, decide otherwise; they allow that the love of money and the love of distinction, are the two great spurs of active life: the only spurs that can generally and permanently goad the natural indolence of human beings to a proper exertion. Does Sir Francis Burdett declaim in Parliament, and on the hustings, from pure love of his country? No! it is from the love of distinction. Did the ancient Romans, of whom so many vaunts are constantly uttered by people of Mr. Cobbett's way of thinking, did they perform their acts of public service from motives purely patriotic? No! their adulation in a thousand instances displays that the love of their country, in the general sense of that phrase, was but another way of denominating their love of distinction.

When the fabled age of gold returns, and all men are good, and live in constant plenty, then we may expect the disinterested greatness that Mr. Cobbett requires. In the mean time we are content to get greatness at any rate, and do not trouble ourselves to enquire whether it be disinterested. It is one of the wise dispensations of Providence that great actions shall not be unattended with the rewards of wealth and distinction. By this dispensation, virtue becomes lovely from the associated charm: and many a man who would never have exerted himself without a hope of reward, is by that hope rendered a valuable member of the community. As long, therefore, as the world goes on in its present course, we shall never be sorry to see merit rewarded either with profit or with fame.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH, DUTCH, AND GOTTENBURGH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, MAY 17.—The Official Journal already begins to throw aside part of the veil which concealed the negociations, whereof Bayonne was the centre, by announcing the conclusion of a treaty between the Emperor and the different Members of the Spanish House.

By the Constitution of our Government, it cannot be made public till it has been communicated to the Senate. But we perceive by the Proclamation of the King of Spain, and that of the Prince of Asturias, that the Emperor Napoleon is clothed with all the rights of the House of Spain. King Charles, Queen Louisa Maria, Queen Maria Louisa, and the Infant Don Francisco, dine to-day with the Emperor, and set off to-morrow for Bourdeaux. They will make this journey in four days, and will repair to Fontainbleau, whence they will go to Compeigne. It is believed that this residence has been destined by his Majesty to King Charles, that he may spend the remainder of his days there. The Prince of Asturias, the Infant Don Carlos, and the Infant Don Antonio, spent the evening yesterday with their Majesties the Emperor and Empress. They will spend two days at Bourdeaux, and will afterwards proceed to Valencey, whence it is probable they will go to Navarre. It is believed that his Majesty has ceded to them that superb domain, and the forest appertaining to it.

"It is said that many Spaniards of distinction are on the road to Bayonne, where, it appears, that the Emperor is about to hold a general Junta. It is presumed that he will be occupied, not only in regulating the succession to the Throne, but also in fixing certain ameliorations, which all good Spaniards call for. Every thing is entirely tranquil in Spain. Things are on the best footing there."

To the above article were joined, a mandate from King Charles to the Junta of the Government, announcing the nomination of the Grand Duke of Berg, Lieutenant-General of the kingdom; and a Proclamation addressed to the Spaniards, both dated on the 4th of May; a Proclamation of the 5th of May, from the Junta to the inhabitants of Madrid; a circular (proclamation) sent on the 5th by the Inquisition, to all the Tribunals of the kingdom; and finally, a letter from the King, to the Supreme Council of Castile, and to the Council of the Inquisition. The first two of these pieces are to the tenor following:—

TO THE SUPREME JUNTA OF THE GOVERNMENT.

"Having judged it expedient to give one same direction to all the forces of our kingdom, in order to maintain security of property and public tranquillity against enemies, as well exterior as interior, we have thought it fit to nominate our cousin, the Grand Duke of Berg, Lieutenant General of the kingdom, who, at the same time, commands the troops of our ally the Emperor of the French. We command the Council of Castile, and the Captains-General and Governors of our provinces, to obey his orders. In the same quality he shall preside over the Junta of the Government.

(Signed) "I THE KING."

PROCLAMATION.

"Spaniards—my beloved subjects, perfidious men. seek to mislead you. They would put arms into your hands against the French troops; they seek alike to arm you against the French, and the French against you. The sacking of all Spain, calamities of every kind would be the result. The spirit of faction, the sad effects of which I have already felt, is still in motion. In the midst of these important and critical circumstances, I am occupied in concerting with my Ally, the Emperor of the French, all that concerns your welfare. Beware of listening to the enemies of it. All those, who speak to you against France, thirst for your blood; they are either the enemies of your nation, or agents of England, who are busily availing themselves of circumstances, and whose intrigues would involve the loss of your colonies, the separation of your provinces, or a series of years of trouble and calamity for your country.

"Spaniards! trust to my experience, and obey that authority which I hold from God and my fathers; follow my example, and think that in the position in which you stand, there is no prosperity and safety for Spaniards, but in the friendship of the Great Emperor, our Ally.

"Given at Bayonne, from the Imperial Palace, stiled Palace of the Government, May 4, 1808.

MAY 19.—The Conservative Senate has just been convoked to an extraordinary meeting on Friday next. After the important documents relative to Spain, published by the official Journal, there is every reason to suppose that this extraordinary meeting must be connected with the affairs of that kingdom; and it is probable that the treaty by which the Emperor Napoleon has just acquired all the right of the House of Bourbon to the Throne of Spain, will be communicated at this Sitting to the chief public body of the State. We are also assured, that there will be presented for the sanction of the Senators, the project of a Senatus-Consulte, relative to the union of Tuscany with the Empire; and that the Government General of those departments which heretofore composed the kingdom of Etruria, will be erected into a great dignity of the empire, and given to General Menou. It is added, that in this case there will be established in that country a Junta, over which a Governor-General will preside, and which will be composed of three Masters of Requests, and an Auditor of State Council, performing the functions of a Secretary-General. Besides the official papers relative to Spain, published in the Moniteur, and the Moniteur has publ hed also a proclamation addressed to the inhabitants of Spain, by the Prince of Austurius, and the other Princes of the Royal Family: wherein their Highnesses announce to the Spaniards, that they have ceded all their right to the Crown of Spain to the Emperor Napoleon. The third of the papers in question is the following:

THE SUPREME JUNTA TO THE INHABITANTS OF MADRID.

"INHABITANTS OF MADRID.

"Your tranquillity will be from henceforth unalterable. You will owe it to the loyalty of your own character; but it will be still more assured to you by the confidence, which is inspired by the laws, and by the prudence of zealous Magistrates, to whom their execution is committed. It is in this conviction that the Supreme Junta of Government proclaims, that in obedience to the dictate of humanity, the allied army has suppressed the Military Commission, established only for one day, as a necessary, though severe measure, which would not have been etabled, but for the perverseness of some individuals; that, from henceforth, every inhabitant, whatsoever may be his rank, who shall have given cause for being seized by the French troops, provided he has not borne arms against them, shall be immediately given over to his proper Judges, and tried by them. And even in the only excepted case, viz. that of having borne arms against the French troops, a Judge nominated by the competent Tribunal of the Nation, shall always assist in regulating the whole of the process against the accused, till sentence is pronounced. No countryman domiciliated in the town, nor strangers shall be molested on account of the peculiarity of his dress; and still less the Ecclesiastics. The carriers employed in bringing provisions to the town, shall henceforward be subject to no vexation, or detention of their carriages or mules. Every individual who shall have just complaints to make, on addressing himself to the Judge of Police, may rest assured, that he will on the same day obtain full justice and reparation, for whatever damage he may have sustained. As to the Muleteers, who are likewise employed in bringing provisions to town, and who generally stay there a few days, only one half of their cattle shall in future be put in requisition, even under the most urgent necessity; and in no case shall they be detained longer than three or four days, for which they shall be paid at the prices already given out. Orders shall be given at those gates of the town, where carriers have suffered arbitrary detentions, in order to be searched and stripped of their arms, that this abuse be in future prevented. But it is also necessary to repeat the order against introducing fire-arms, or other prohibited weapons into the city; they ought always to be deposited at the gate.

Given at the Palace, by order of the Supreme Junta of Govern"ment, May 5, 1808,

The Compte CASA VALENCIA, Secretary."

PARIS, MAY 19.—The Prince of Asturias and the Infant Don Carlos and Don Antonio, have repeated their renunciation of all their rights to the Spanish throne (already expressed by their assent to the treaty previously known to have been concluded), by a solemn Proclamation addressed to the Spaniards from Bourdeaux, on the 12th inst. and which is published in this day's Moniteur. This document is to the following effect:—

"The Prince of Asturias, and the Infants Don Carlos and Don Antonio, deeply sensible of the attachment and fidelity displayed towards them by all the Spaniards, with the utmost grief behold them on the point of being plunged into anarchy, and threatened with all the dreadful calamities consequent thereupon; and being aware that these might, in a great measure, proceed from the state of ignorance in which they now are, both as to the principles of the conduct hitherto pursued by their Highnesses and the plans already formed for the benefit of their country, their Highnesses find themselves under the necessity of making an effort to open their eyes, by that salutary counsel which they require, in order to prevent any obstruction to the execution of those plans; and thus to give them the dearest proof of the affection which they cherish for them.

"Their Highnesses cannot, therefore, abstain from informing them, that the circumstances under which the Prince, upon the abdication of the King, assumed the reins of government; the occupation of several provinces of the kingdom, and of all the frontier fortresses, by a numerous body of French troops; the actual presence of more than 60,000 of that nation in the capital and the environs; in short, the knowledge of many other circumstances known only to themselves, convinced them that, surrounded by difficulties, they had only chosen, among various expedients, that which was likely to produce the least evil; and that, as such, they resolved upon a journey to Bayonne.

"On the arrival of their Royal Highnesses at Bayonne, the Prince, then King, was unexpectedly apprised that his father had protested against his act of abdication, declaring that it was not voluntary. The Prince, who accepted the crown only under the impression that the abdication was voluntary, was no sooner informed of the existence of such a Protest, than his sense of filial duty instantly determined him to give back the throne

But a short time after, the King his father abdicated it in his own name, and that of his whole race, in favour of the Emperor of the French, in order that the Emperor, consulting the good of the nation, should determine the person and race which should hereafter occupy it.

"Their Royal Highnesses, in this state of things, considering the situation in which themselves stand, and the difficult circumstances in which Spain is placed—considering that, under these circumstances, any attempt on the part of the inhabitants of Spain for the maintenance of their rights, would be not only useless but ruinous, and could tend only to make streams of blood flow, and to render certain the loss of at least a great part of her provinces, and that of all her trans-marine colonies;—Being further convinced, that the most effectual means of preventing these evils, is that their Royal Highnesses, for themselves, and all connected with them, should assent to the renunciation of their rights to the throne, a renunciation already executed by the King, their Father; taking also into consideration, that his Majesty the Emperor of the French engages, in this case, to maintain complete the independence and integrity of the Spanish Monarchy, and its transmarine colonies, without retaining the smallest of its dominions for himself, or separating any part from the whole; that his Imperial Majesty engages to maintain the unity of the Catholic religion, the security of property, and the continuance of the existing laws and usages which have for so long a period of time, and in so indisputable a manner, preserved the power and honour of the Spanish nation—their Highnesses conceive that they afford the most undoubted proof of their generosity, and their affection towards it, and their eagerness to return the ardent attachment which it bears towards them, by sacrificing, to the utmost extent of their power, their individual and personal interests for the benefit of that nation, and by this present instrument to assent, as they already have assented in a particular treaty, to the renunciation of all their rights to the throne. They accordingly release the Spaniards from all their duties in this respect, and exhort them to consult the common interests of their country, by conducting themselves in a peaceable manner, and by looking for their happiness to the power and wise arrangements of the Emperor Napoleon. The Spaniards may assure themselves that by their zeal to conform their conduct to those arrangements, they will give their Prince and the two Infants the strongest proof of their loyalty; in like manner as their Royal Highnesses give them the greatest example of their paternal affection, by renouncing all their rights, and sacrificing their own interests for the happiness of the Spaniards, the sole object of their wishes.

(Signed) "I, The Prince.

"Bourdeaux, May 12, 1808. "Carlos and Antonio."

TO THE SUPREME COUNCIL OF CASTILLE, THE COUNCIL OF INQUISITION, &c.

"In the present extraordinary circumstances, we have resolved to give a new proof of our affection towards our beloved subjects, whose happiness, during the whole course of our reign, has been the constant object of our solicitude. We have therefore abdicated all our claims upon the Spanish kingdoms in favour of our Friend and Ally, the Emperor of the French, by a treaty which has been signed and ratified, and which stipulates for the integrity and independence of the Spanish kingdoms, and the preservation of our Holy Religion, not only as the predominant, but as the sole and exclusive religion in Spain.

"We have therefore thought proper to send you this letter, that you should conform yourselves thereto, publish its contents, and make every exertion in support of the Emperor Napoleon. Display the utmost frankness and friendship towards the French, and above all, direct all your care to preserve the country from insurrections and tumults.

"In the new condition upon which we are entering, we shall frequently turn our eyes towards you, and happy shall we be to know that you enjoy peace and contentment.

"Given at the Imperial Palace, the 4th of May, 1808.

"I, The King."

MAY 24.—Their Spanish Majesty's are daily expected at Fontainbleau, where every thing is in preparation. Several baggage-waggons have already been sent home from hence thither, and a squadron of Chasseur Cavalry of the Imperial Guard arrived yesterday, which will be followed by a detachment of the horse-guards. According to letters from Tours, his Majesty was to arrive on the 21st. The Queen, Maria Louisa, was not expected till the 25th.

SPAIN.

MADRID, MAY 13.—The Grand Duke of Berg resides now in the Palace. The public service goes on as usual. Perfect repose reigns in the city. We expect every moment tidings of the choice of our new King. The abuses of every kind which exhausted our country, would at last have brought it to destruction, and without doubt we should not have escaped the horrors of a bloody revolution. Now we entertain the hope that our new Sovereign will gradually, and without violence, restore our old Monarchy to its youth again, and that our longing for amelioration and reform will be at length gratified.

ITALY.

ROME, APRIL 28.—The Senator, Lucien Bonaparte, quitted Rome on the 14th of this month, to repair to Florence, where, it is understood, he descended first at the Black Eagle, and afterwards settled in the Hotel Ximenes, where General Fiorella lodged. His Holiness persists still in the same disposition with respect to the concessions which have been required of him. Towards the end of the last month, his holiness addressed, through his Secretary of State, the following circular letter to all the Cardinals who had received orders to quit Rome, conceived in these terms:—

"His Holiness, our Master, has commanded his Secretary of State, Cardinal Doria Pamfili, to make known to your Eminence, that his heart has been penetrated with the most poignant grief, on being informed of the order given by the French General to so many members of the Sacred College, to quit Rome within three days. His Holiness, who clearly sees that this measure tends to overthrow the empire of the Church, since those members are removed from his person who are necessary to the direction of his affairs, and at last his minister, his Vicar, cannot in conscience permit this departure. He prohibits, therefore, every one upon his oath of obedience to remove from Rome, unless absolutely compelled by force: and his Holiness, foreseeing this case, that after having torn your Eminence from his bosom, you might be left at a certain distance from Rome, is of opinion, that you should not continue your journey, unless compulsion should be used, to the place designated to you; in order that it may be a matter of public notoriety that your removal from the head of the Church has not been voluntary, but from compulsion. The virtues of all the individuals who have received the order to depart, alone support the afflicted soul of his Holiness, and are a pledge to him, that, according to his example, they will support those persecutions with patience, and that the sentiments of the Sacred College, far from being weakened, will be strengthened."

Though this piece had been sent to the Cardinals before their departure, it did not prevent some of them from going voluntarily to the places pointed out to them. M. Lefebre, who, after the departure of M. Alquier, remained in this city, in the quality of Charge d'Affaires from France to his Holiness, has just set out to Paris, carrying with him all the papers and archives of the legation.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, MAY 30.

Lord Auckland, after some general observations upon the ruinous consequences of the late Orders in Council, and the distressing effects they had had upon the trade and commerce of the country, moved that the returns of the Exports and Imports, and of the duties and drawbacks for the four months beginning with January, in the year 1807, and also for the four months corresponding in the present year, be laid before the House.

Lord Bathurst made no objection to the required production, provided the accounts for the whole year were laid upon the table, as the House were not able, he said, to draw a correct conclusion from partial statements; he therefore moved for some further accounts, and both motions were agreed to.

Lord Stanhope rose to discharge the order of the day for the third reading of the Indictment Bill, which included Lord Ellenborough, who complained of the Noble Lord's attack upon him on a former night, in terms as warm as were severe. Lord Stanhope replied, that he had talked of arraigning judges, but he intended no allusion what ever to the Lordship.

Lords Holland, Erskine, Lauderdale, and the Lord Chancellor severally spoke upon the merits of the Bill, which was eventually read a third time, after a division, in which there appeared thirteen Contents and six Non-Contents.

The Irish Curates Residence Bill, and the Irish Glebe Bill were severally committed; and the Chancellor having affirmed the decree of the Court of Session, in the appeal of Duke of Hamilton against Scott the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 31.

The Vauxhall and Henley upon Thames Bridge Bills were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

The Irish Curates' Residence Bill, and the Irish Glebe House Bill were reported, after some conversation as to the amendments the former received in the Committee the preceding evening.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1.

The Royal Assent was given by Commission to the Duchess of Brunswick's Bill, the Irish Fees Bill, and several other Bills.

The Bills on the Table were forwarded a stage each, after which the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.

The Irish Militia Bill went through a Committee.

Mr. Wharton, Colonel Ellison, and others of the House of Commons, brought up the Pauper Lunatic Bill, and several private Bills; all of which were read a first time.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3.

The Commissioners of Military Enquiry Bill, and eight private Bills received the Royal Assent by Commission. The Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, Lord Walsingham, and Lord Dartmouth.

Mr. Wharton and several other Members of the House of Commons brought up the additional Bill for continuing the Commissioners of Military Enquiry, which was read a first time.

After a short conversation between the Marquis of Buckingham and the Lord Chancellor, the Kingston Small Debts Bill was read a second time.

The Wreck Interment Bill, and the Irish Militia Volunteering Bill were read a third time.

The Judges were ordered to be summoned for Thursday next, to attend the Committee of Privileges in the Banbury Appeal.

The House then adjourned till Wednesday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, MAY 30.

Colonel Desborough reported from the Downpatrick Election Committee, that the sitting Member, Mr. Croker, was duly elected, and that none of the petitions were frivolous nor vexatious.

The Report of the Committee on the Plan for improving Holyhead Harbour, was laid before the House by Sir A. Wellesley, and ordered to be printed.

The Vauxhall Bridge Bill was passed, and ordered to the Lords.

Mr. Sheridan presented a Petition from Mr. James Tandy, a wine-merchant, in Dublin, who had been taken into custody and examined before the Privy Council at the Castle, where he answered the questions put to him, and was afterwards confined twelve months without being brought to trial, and then discharged, after undergoing great hardships, and to the great loss of his business. Mr. Sheridan also presented a similar Petition from Mr Barney Coile, Mr. Ridgeway, and another, which were laid on the table. Mr. Sheridan said he should have other Petitions to present, and would move that the whole be referred to a Committee.

Mr. Wharton brought up the report of the Committees for granting annuities in the Three per Cents, which was agreed to, and a Bill was ordered thereon.

THE SMALL-POX.

Mr. Fuller rose, to move for leave to bring in a Bill to prevent the spreading of the infection of the small-pox. His object was to render a service to his fellow-creatures, as the mortality increased a fourth in consequence of inoculated patients and others infected with the disease having been exposed to public view. The disease was more fatal to the robust than infants, and to lovely woman pregnant the chance was twenty to one against them if they took the disease. His object was not to propose general vaccination, and did not wish to impose any mode of inoculation on the parents. His object was to have a mark put upon all houses where there was infection, and those that did not do so to be subject to a penalty, to be expended by the removal of those who took the diseased to an insulated place, to be provided for the purpose. He observed, that such a measure was not without precedent, as a Bill to prevent the spreading of the contagion was passed in the reign of James II.

Leave was given to bring in the Bill.

Mr. Rose gave notice that, he would make a motion to have the Vaccine Matter distributed throughout the country.

ROMAN CATHOLICS.

Sir John Newport rose to move, that persons be admitted to become Governors and Deputy-Governors of the Bank of Ireland, without taking the Oath of Supremacy. He observed, that in no country, except Ireland, was there any such distinction, as that the religious tenets of any man should interfere with his commercial pursuits, nor did he see any reason why the religious tenets of any man should be a bar to his rendering a service in commercial concerns to the subscribers to the Bank. As the charter of the Bank of Ireland was about to be renewed, he was anxious that the disabilities to serve to which he alluded, should be done away. He therefore moved, "That it was the opinion of the House, that any person professing the Catholic religion should be deemed eligible to become a Governor or Deputy-Governor of the Bank of Ireland, if he was otherwise qualified with respect to property.

Mr. Forster observed, that the Charter of the Irish Bank was copied from the Charter of the Bank of England, and did not see any necessity for disturbing the question at present. The Hon. Member concluded by moving the Order of the Day. The House divided, when there appeared, against the resolution, 64—for it, 61—majority 3.

LOCAL MILITIA.

On the clause requiring the Oath of the party to the amount of the Bounty received, there was a pretty long discussion between Sir Samuel Romilly, Lord Castlereagh, and some other Gentlemen relative to the propriety of the clause; and it was at length agreed that the words respecting the oath should be struck out. On the clause respecting the rotation by which a man might be balloted for a second term of service, there was some discussion. Lord Castlereagh acquiesced in the motion, and it was agreed to.

Lord Temple objected to that clause of the Bill which subjects men called out under the Act to corporal punishment; and proposed that no man should be so punished, unless the regiment was called out for actual service, and in consequence of a sentence of a Court-Martial approved by his Majesty.

Lord Castlereagh could see no inconvenience from the power given by the Act, as it was not likely to be exercised except the men were called out for actual service. He deprecated the interference of Parliament with the discipline of the army.

After some observations from Mr. R. Dundas, Sir G. Warrender, Mr. Frankland, and Mr. Lyttleton, the Committee divided.—Ayes 14—Noes 101—Majority 87

The report respecting the Charter of the Bank of Ireland was brought up and agreed to, and a Bill ordered to be brought in thereon.

The other Orders of the Day were then disposed of, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 31.

Mr. Fuller brought in a Bill to prevent the spreading of the Infection of the Small-Pox.

A Message was delivered from the Lords by two Judges, informing the House that they had agreed to the Duchess of Brunswick's Annuity Bill without any amendment.

A Message was delivered to the House by two Masters in Chancery, from their Lordships, that they had agreed to the Assessed Taxes Bill, the Tanners Bill, and several private Bills.

Mr. Wharton obtained leave to bring in a Bill to permit the Exportation of Sugar and Coffee from the British West-India Settlements to the South of Europe, beyond Cape Finisterre.

Lord Binning brought up a further report of the Committee on the Distilleries, relative to the preventing the importation of Foreign Spirits, and for equalizing the duty on Rum, which was ordered to be printed.

The Hon. Mr. Ward moved, that there be laid before the House an account of the price charged for cloathing the Artillery and the German Legion, for the year 1805 and 1806; and also for cloathing the Horse Artillery and Corps of Drivers, for the same period, which were agreed to.

Mr. Huskisson presented a Petition from the Veterinary College, praying Parliamentary aid, which was ordered to be laid on the table.

Doctor Lawrence brought in a Bill to prevent the failing of anchors and cables, and for appointing Commissioners, which was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time and printed.

SIR HOME POPHAM.

Mr. Lyttleton rose to bring forward his motion respecting Sir Home Popham. He said, the subject was first suggested by the motion of an Hon. Baronet, (Sir Francis Burdett,) relative to the Droits of the Admiralty. On that occasion, he followed the Hon. Baronet out of the House, with whom he had not any previous personal acquaintance, and recommended to him to move for certain papers respecting the Droits of the Crown. On perusing the latter, he observed that the Hon. Captain had embarked in illegal transactions, and on a memorial he succeeded in having the cargo of the ship Etruria restored, and the gallant Admiral who had a right to prizage did not receive any. He observed, that in 1791 Sir Home Popham was on half pay, and applied to the Admiralty for leave to proceed to the East Indies, but was refused. He then resided at Ostend, and contrary to law traded to the British East India settlements, though he said that his object was to trade alone to a Danish settlement. The Hon. Member charged him with trading to almost every settlement in the East Indies, and having afterwards touched at Crook-Haven, in Ireland, and of having smuggled five chests of tea off Dungeness. He proceeded to read a variety of extracts from the papers laid on the table, to prove the illegality of the transactions, and condemned the Lords of the Treasury in complying with the memorial of Sir Home Popham, with respect to the restoration of the cargo. He concluded by moving a resolution agreeing with the documents laid on the table, and concluded with moving that Sir Home Popham acted in a manner contrary to the character of a British subject, and disgraceful to that of a British Officer.

Sir Home Popham entered at some length into a detail of the business. He stated, that he had a great abhorrence to remain idle, and was anxious to improve himself in his profession. He had sailed to the East Indies, and resided for some time at the Prince of Wales's Island, and afterwards went to Calcutta, and for the important services which he rendered, he obtained the approbation of the Government abroad, and also of the East India Company at home.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1.

The Royal Assent was given by Commission to the Duchess of Brunswick's Annuity Bill, and several other Bills.

A Message from the Lords informed the House, that they had agreed to the Irish Glebe House bill, with several amendments, to which they desired the concurrence of the House.

GAME LAWS.

Mr. Chapman obtained leave to bring in a Bill for repealing the Act with respect to the penalty of killing Hares, and also that part of an Act which imposed a penalty of 20*l.* for depuing a person to kill Game.

The Lunatic Paupers Bill was passed, and ordered to the Lords.

IRISH UNION.

Sir John Newport read a letter from Messrs. Mahony, of Cork, stating that they had shipped goods, which arrived at Liverpool, consisting of stuffs, which they directed their agents at Liverpool, Messrs Simmonds, to re-ship for the Brazils, which they did not do, because the Collector charged a duty amounting to 40*l.* on three bales of goods, of the value of 200*l.* contrary to the Act of Union, and even a duty was charged on sending them back to Cork. Their agents sent a memorial to the Commissioners of the Customs in London, but received no redress on the subject. He therefore concluded with moving, that a copy of the said memorial be laid before the House.

Mr. Foster and Mr. Percival said, that they did not apprehend that it was done willfully, and that it could not be supposed that the Collectors comprehended clearly the Act of Union, on which the most enlightened Members of the House differed in opinion.

The motion was then put and agreed to.

PROPERTY OF FOREIGNERS.

Mr. Baukes gave notice that he would make a motion on Friday se'nnight to take away the exemption from the Property Tax in favour of foreigners who had money in the British Funds.

TRADE WITH AMERICA.

Mr. Rose said, the object of the motion which he would have the honour to submit to the House, was to shew America that this country was desirous of placing her in the same situation as the most favoured nations; and to manifest to the United States our friendly disposition. He was also anxious to shew them on what grounds we would enter into a treaty with them at a future period, without anticipating any such treaty at present. He therefore concluded by moving, "That it was the opinion of the Committee, that, for a time to be limited, that the goods and manufactures of the United States of America be permitted to be exported into this country in American or British ships, on payment of the lowest duties from any other foreign country. And that tobacco and snuff, the produce and manufacture of the United States of America, imported in American or British ships, be permitted to be imported into Great Britain on paying the lowest duties of the most favoured countries.

The motions were severally agreed to, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

THE BUDGET.

Mr. Percival said, before he stated the terms of the Loan he would recapitulate the Supply, as he had done on a former night, and afterwards state the Ways and Means to meet the supply.

SUPPLY.

For the Navy	£17,496,047
Army of Great Britain and Ireland, including Barrack Department, excess of Extraordinaries, &c.	19,089,180
Ordnance for ditto	4,334,571
Miscellaneous Services	1,750,000
To the East India Company	1,500,000
Vote of Credit	2,500,000
Deficiency of Malt, with other particulars, would make the total supply	54,573,000
Leaving to be provided for Great Britain	48,319,807

WAYS AND MEANS.

Malt Duty	3,000,000
Bank Advances	2,500,000
Surplus Consolidated Fund	728,000
Estimate surplus of ditto	3,500,000
War Taxes	25,000,000
Lotteries	300,000
Loan for Great Britain	8,000,000
Issue of Exchequer Bills	1,000,000
These, with other advances, would amount to	£48,441,087 which would leave a surplus in favour of Great Britain.

The Loan contracted for was 8,000,000*l.* for Great Britain, and 2,500,000*l.* for Ireland. The Contractors agreed to take 118*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* in the 4 per Cents. which would create a capital, with the vote of credit, of 9,114,000*l.* for Great Britain, and the total amount of the charge would be 475,536*l.* bearing an interest of 4*l.* 14*s.* 6½*d.* He then proceeded to state the remainder of the Ways and Means arising from the issue of Exchequer Bills, and the Assessed Taxes that were to meet the Supply, and pointed out the operation it would have on the Sinking Fund, and concluded by moving resolutions conformably to his statement.

Mr. Tierney and Lord Henry Petty made a few observations on the statements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after which the resolutions were agreed to, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

On the motion of Sir F. Turton, the adjourned debate on the Carnatic question was resumed, and after a long discussion, four resolutions, condemning the conduct of the Marquis of Wellesley, were separately put—when the numbers were, for the first 18—against it 102: and the remaining three were negatived by a greater majority.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.

Mr. Parnel gave notice, that he would move, on Wednesday se'nnight, that the Petitions praying for a Commutation of Tythes, from the counties of Kerry and Tipperary, be referred to a Committee.

SCOTCH JUDGES.

The Lord Advocate of Scotland moved, that the Speaker do now leave the Chair,

Mr. Banks expressed a wish that the Bill should be postponed for a week, that the House might receive further information on the subject. He was anxious for its being deferred, for certain documents appertaining to the measure were now investigating before the Committee of Finance. The report, however, respecting the business before the House, could be separated, and presented in the course of a couple of days, and for this reason he was anxious to delay the measure. He could not avoid embracing the present opportunity of stating his objections to have the Annuity granted out of the Consolidated Fund of this country, when there was a large balance in hand of a Fund in Scotland, which was appropriated to the pensions granted in that part of the United Kingdom. He therefore moved, that the word "now" be left out of the motion, for the purpose of inserting the words "this day se'nnight."

The Lord Advocate of Scotland defended the Bill, but did not think it by any means necessary to postpone the Bill until the report alluded to was laid before the House. The Fund in Scotland mentioned by the Hon. Gentleman depended on the life of the King, and any annuity or pension granted thereout was at pleasure, consequently the Judges would be dependant on his Majesty, contrary to the principle of the annuities granted to Judges in this country. For these reasons he could not agree to the amendment moved by the Hon. Member.

The House divided for the Speaker's leaving the Chair, Ayes, 62—Noes, 32—Majority, 30.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee on the Bill, Mr. Wharton in the Chair.

An amendment was proposed to exempt the minor Judges of the Exchequer from the provisions of the Bill, on the ground that the Court had scarcely any judicial business to transact, and that one out of the five was sufficient to sign his name in the affairs of the revenue.

The amendment was negatived, and after some further conversation, the report was ordered to be received.

The Orders of the Day were then disposed of, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3.

The Royal Assent was given by Commission to the Military Commissioners' Act, and several private Acts.

The Land Receiver of the Revenue Bill was passed, and ordered to the Lords.

Mr. Chaplin brought in a Bill for repealing the Act for inflicting a penalty for the killing a hare, and for the appointment of Gamekeepers, which was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Wednesday.

The Three per Cents. Annuity Bill was read a second time, and was ordered to be committed on Thursday next.

The House in a Committee went through the Small Pox Prevention Bill, and made several amendments, Mr. Wharton in the Chair.

Lord Folkstone considered the Bill of very great importance, and thought it should be deferred till next Session.

Mr. Fuller said, when he moved for leave to bring in the Bill he intimated that such was his intention.

The report was ordered to be received this day three months, and the Bill printed.

The Ale Licences Bill was ordered to be committed on Wednesday next.

INLAND PROMISSORY NOTES.

Mr. Harrison rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to restrain the circulation of Inland Promissory Notes, and Bills of Exchange of small value. He observed, that notes were issued under 20s. in the potteries and other manufactories, and in the collieries, some of which were more taken and of no value, and the existing act did not empower the offenders to be taken before a Magistrate, and many of them were forged. He therefore moved, "For leave to bring in a Bill to restrain the negotiation of Promissory Notes, or Bills of Exchange under 20s. in that part of Great Britain called England." The motion was put and agreed to.

HACKNEY COACHES.

Mr. Huskisson observed, that according to an Act which had passed there was a per centage when oats were at a guinea a quarter, but it was difficult to calculate the per centage, and consequently great mistakes occurred, and the fare was sometimes over-charged. He had also to remark, that there were from 4 to 500 carriages plied between London and the neighbouring villages, who took up passengers and dropt them in another place within the limits prescribed, but it was difficult to proceed against the owners for such offence. He therefore moved, "For leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the Rates taken by Licensed Hackney Coachmen, and establishing others in lieu thereof, and for other purposes, which motion was agreed to."

The Secretary at War obtained leave to bring in a Bill to oblige the Clerks of sub-divisions to account for the money in hands, and to enable the Secretary at War to sue for and to recover the same.

The report on the Scotch Judges Annuity Bill was brought up, and the amendments agreed to, and the Bill was ordered to be read a third time on Friday.

MILITARY COURTS MARTIAL.

Mr. Lyttleton rose, in pursuance of the notice he had given, to move for leave to bring in a Bill to assimilate Military to Naval Courts Martial. The Hon. Member observed, that nothing was further from his intention than to entrench on the prerogative of the Crown. In the reign of Henry the VIIIth the power of the King over the army was first recognized, and in the reign of William, who marched his Dutch regiments to quell an insurrection, the Mutiny Bill passed, which gave the Commons a power annually of passing it or not. His Majesty at present had the appointment of all the Officers of a Court Martial, and the prosecution was conducted by an Officer of the Crown, but what he complained of the most was, the power of the Crown to alter the sentence of a Court Martial from acquittal to actual censure. The Hon. Member then proceeded to notice the Petition of the Hon. Cochrane Johnstone, presented in a former Session, who was acquitted by a Court Martial, but the sentence was reversed, and he was passed over in the list of promotions. In the Navy, the sentence of a Court Martial was never altered, and he could not conceive why there should be any difference in the two services. There was another hardship under which an Officer tried laboured, and that was, that he could be kept under arrest for an unlimited time, as there was no period mentioned within which his sentence could be made known. He therefore moved for leave to bring in a Bill "To expedite the trial of Military Courts Martial, and to prevent any undue interference in the proceedings or any alteration of the sentence."

The Secretary at War and Sir A. Wellesley were of opinion, that any such Bill could not be entertained, as the Mutiny Bill was passed, and could not by a clause contained therein be altered. His Majesty, in repeated instances, where an Officer was ordered to be remanded, dispensed with the carrying the sentence into effect, and the Bill would be so far nugatory, as, though the King could not alter the sentence, he may dismiss the Officer, which was a prerogative that no person would think it proper or wise to infringe.

Sir F. Burdett spoke in favour of the motion, on the grounds that it would prevent any evil adviser of his Majesty succeeding in recommending the alteration of the sentence of a meritorious officer who had been acquitted, which had been the case in several instances.

Mr. Lyttleton consented to withdraw his motion, after which the orders of the day were disposed of, and the House at a late hour adjourned.

PROVINCIALS.

MONTHLY AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

The sowing of all sorts of spring or Lent corn crops, even those of the late Barley kinds, in most of the northern districts, has been some time finished; and, from the complete manner in which they have been put into the ground, and the warm showery weather which has since succeeded, they cannot but have come forward in a rapid and vigorous manner; while all those crops of both the grain and pulse kinds which were put into the soil at a more early period, have an unusually healthy and promising appearance. The influence of the uncommonly fine growing weather during the whole of the month, has even been considerable on the sown Wheat crops, so as to have rendered the aspect of those which had been greatly injured by the alternations of frost and thaw, in the preceding months, in some cases highly favourable; consequently less mischief than was at first apprehended will probably be sustained in such crops. The same causes have likewise had the happiest effects in obviating the unusual scarcity of fodder, which was almost every where experienced by farmers about the close of the last month, by the sudden spring which has been given to vegetation, and the luxuriant flush of grass, which has been the consequence. This has been more particularly the case in the midland, western, and southern grazing districts. In the bay districts, likewise, the effects of the same circumstances have been equally evident. The grass, which had every where the most backward and unpromising appearance the last month, has experienced a most sudden change, now appearing, in most instances, not only favourable in its aspect, but the crops more forward and full than could possibly have been supposed; so that the quantities, when cut, will most probably be as large, if not more so, than is usually the case. The prices of most sorts of store stock have been kept down hitherto, by the scarcity of all kinds of fodder; but it is probable they will now be higher. Fat stock, of all descriptions, has been sold at high prices, but the late sudden flush of grass may, perhaps, have some effect in lowering them.

MANCHESTER, JUNE 1.—I am sorry to inform you that the numerous body of cotton-weavers in this town and neighbourhood are yet still dissatisfied with the proposals which the master manufacturers have agreed on at their meeting last night at the Bull's Head Inn here, which is 10 per cent. advance on all kinds of cotton goods weaving, to take place this day (June 1), and 10 per cent. again advance, to take place on the 1st of August next—this makes a full 20 per cent. which does not meet the approbation of this great body of useful men. Their demands are, and they do stand out and persist in having 5s. 6d.

to the pound sterling advance, an advance which is 33 1-3d per cent. so that between the manufacturer and weaver there is just 13 1-3d per cent. and I am sorry to add, at this moment, not any of them will go to the loom, neither here nor any part of the neighbourhood, and upon a moderate calculation there are not less than 60,000 looms, in the cotton trade only, standing still in this town and neighbourhood of 12 miles. If any of them are at the shuttle, parties rush into the house, cellar or garret, and take it from them. This, I am sorry to say, is too true. Great numbers of weavers walk in small parties about the streets, and in a peaceable manner.—I am happy to say all is regularly quiet.—Wednesday night, June 1.

TUESDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

Admiralty Office, May 31.

Inclosure from Vice-Admiral Whitshed, Commander in Chief on the Coast of Ireland, to Mr. Pole, dated at Cork, the 24th inst.

His Majesty's ship Virginie, at Sea, 20th May, 1808.
Latitude 46 North, longitude 14 West.

SIR,—I beg leave to detail for your information, the capture of the Guelderland Dutch frigate of 36 guns, commanded by Captain Pool, Knight of the Order of the Kingdom, who is wounded. She was manned with 257 men, and had 23 passengers; a fortnight from Bergen.

It was after an hour and a half's gallant defence, in a night action, on the 19th instant, that he surrendered; his masts being shot by the board, 25 of his men killed, and 49 severely wounded. The enemy wore three times, and in his effort to come round the fourth, fell on board the Virginie, and did her the only damage worth notice; for I have been fortunate, having only one man killed and one badly wounded. The night was extremely dark, and the swell so great, that the boarders could not act.

If any credit is attached to this transaction, I entreat you to bestow it on the officers and men; who, under every circumstance in service, merit my warmest commendation; in this I include the Officer of the Royal Marines, and the gallantry of his party.

Could any thing surpass the courage of the people, it was their dexterity in working the ship, which enabled me to keep close to the enemy; and their exertions in getting the boats out to rescue the men of the Guelderland from the flames, that ship taking fire soon after she struck; but through the firm discipline of the enemy, it was put out.

Allow me to mention the First Lieutenant, Mr. John Davies, a good Officer, of eleven years standing; and Mr. Nathaniel Norton, a Mate that has passed for a Lieutenant.

A List of Killed and Wounded on board his Majesty's ship Virginie, in Action with the Dutch National Frigate Guelderland, on the 19th May, 1808.

William Little, able seaman, killed.
John Woodcock, able seaman, wounded.
William Blanchard, landman, slightly wounded.

(Signed) E. BRACE, Captain.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

The American President has published two official documents on her disputes with England and France. One is a letter from Mr. ERSKINE to the American Government, on the Orders in Council; the other a letter from M. CHAMPAGNY to General ARMSTRONG, on the same subject. It seems now almost necessary that America unite either with England or with France: for the Frenchman's letter amounts to a command that America shall declare war against us. It even asserts, that the Emperor considers war to have been "declared from the day on which England published her decrees." But if the Americans should not view the matter in the same light, all their vessels, which have yet been sequestered, are to be condemned. Thus we ascertain what was long ago suspected, that BONAPARTE had insisted on America's going to war against England.

Mr. ERSKINE's letter points out the exceptions which the Orders of Council contain, in behalf of the Americans. They are, by these Orders, allowed to carry on a direct trade with the Colonies of France. They are allowed either to retain the produce of those same hostile Colonies for home consumption, or to bring it to England, and from hence to re-export it even to France, on the payment of such a duty only, as will place French and British colonial exports on the same footing in the Continental markets. Flour, grain, tobacco, the growth of America, they are allowed to export from hence into France, without paying any transit duty whatever.

In another communication the President had laid before Congress the last French and Spanish Decrees against the Neutral Commerce. To him they are arguments for the further continuation of the Act of Embargo.

There are also published certain instructions sent to Messrs. PINCKNEY and MONROE, on their conduct of the Treaty with Lords HOLLAND and AUCKLAND. As this Treaty was never enforced, the directions respecting it are scarcely interesting, except as they shew the sentiment that America entertained when they were given. This one thing is remarkable: Mr. MADDISON, after instructing the negociators to procure an exemption of merchantmen from a search for deserters, adds, that an article to the above effect had actually, at a prior period, been acquiesced in by Lord HAWKESBURY and Mr. ADDINGTON, but had been frustrated by an exception of Lord ST. VINCENT.

The disturbances in Spain still continue to occupy the principal part of the public attention. BONAPARTE has at length completed the humiliation both of the KING and of the Prince of the Spanish Royal Family; the King having, in imitation of the Prince, absolutely resigned his power. It is supposed that Murat, the Grand Duke of Berg, will now become the Sovereign of Spain.

Some of our cotemporaries have spoken largely of the advantages that England will derive from assisting the Spaniards in any attempts to shake off the French yoke, and urged our Ministers to be strenuous and early in affording all possible encouragement and aid to the people of Cadiz, Madrid, and those other places in which a disposition for insurrection is manifested. For our own part we are not inclined to be so sanguine in our expectations on this subject. It was long ago our opinion, which we do not hesitate to assert, that no efforts which Spain is likely to make will have much effect for the general interests of Europe, or for our particular advantage. And how can we do any good to Spain by the small number of troops which our utmost efforts could collect for her assistance? Would not Bonaparte be able to bring ten soldiers to bear upon every one of ours? And in the mean time, what shall we have done? Why, we shall have made a powerful diversion in favour of France. We shall have left our own coasts unguarded, for the sake of helping the Spaniards: and Bonaparte, seeing our strength dispersed, which if retained at home might defy his efforts, will have an opportunity of carrying into effect his long nurtured and favourite project of an English invasion. We wonder that the Editors of the Newspapers have not yet learned the futility of these partial and hasty coalitions. Certainly this country has had the advantage, or rather, the misfortune, of examples enow upon this subject.

The Gotteuburgh Mail, due on Sunday, arrived on Thursday. From Finland and Norway there is nothing new. The Russians have been obliged to surrender in Aland: but they still keep possession of Gothland, the Eye of the Baltic. This is a station much more important than Aland, which is of consequence only as being near to Stockholm.

But now that our Expedition is arrived on the Swedish coast, it seems that the leaders of it do not know what to do. Instructions, it is said, will be sent from England.—War carried on upon this system can be but of little avail against an enemy so prompt and vigorous as he with whom we have to deal. Probably a desire of accounting for this abeyance of our Expedition, has occasioned the recent reports of an Armistice having been concluded between Russia and Swedeh, which is said to be preparatory to a pacification.

Turkey is supposed to have joined France against us. The insurrection at Constantinople about the end of March is believed to have been one of those insurrections which the Janissaries are so often in the habit of exciting, either to attain their arrears of pay, or to force the Government to make fresh concessions to them.—But the Turkish Government, though it may side with France against us, will not thereby purchase security from French oppression. The dismemberment of Turkey has long been arranged by the destroyer General, and the moment he has settled the affairs of Spain, we shall find him carving out the Turkish Provinces.—Russia is already taking steps to secure Moldavia and Wallacia to herself.

We understand that a communication was on Friday made to the Lord Mayor by the Lords of the Admiralty; and it is said, that in the expected event of the surrender of the fleet at Cadiz, the River Fencibles and others will be allowed to volunteer their services to bring the ships to England.

The Hamburgh Papers are said to contain a Russian Ukase, resembling the Decree published some time ago in Holland, enacting provisions to regulate the foreign commerce. No ship, whether neutral or otherwise, shall be permitted to sail from a Russian port, without first giving security that she is not destined to an English port; and the parties will not be released from their bond, until it is legally proved that the vessel has actually arrived at the port for which she cleared out.

Accounts to a late date were received on Thursday from Lisbon. Junot is raising troops by a military conscription in Portugal, which includes every male from 15 to 30 years of age. The Portuguese, as may naturally be expected, express all the discontent which they dare at this measure.

The Ladies of the fugitive Bourbon Family are expected soon in this country, and the Marquis of Buckingham is constructing additional apartments at Gosfield for their reception. Louis XVIII. as the fugitives call him, is at this time on a visit to the Prince of Conde, at Wanstead.

A person has undertaken, for a trifling wager, to hop round Lincoln's Inn-square, without resting or assistance, and afterwards to devour five pounds weight of rump steaks at a neighbouring public-house; the whole to be accomplished in half an hour. To-morrow morning, at ten o'clock, is the time fixed to decide it.

MR. PITT'S BIRTH-DAY.

Saturday se'nnight, the anniversary dinner in celebration of Mr. Pitt's Birth-Day was held at Merchant Taylor's Hall. After the healths of the King, Queen, and Royal Family, had been given in the usual way, an Ode was delivered from the head of the table.—The Duke of Beaufort, who was in the Chair, gave, according to the last line of the Ode—"The Immortal Memory of Mr. Pitt"—which was drank and accompanied with acclamations; and Mr. Gibbon gave a song adapted to the occasion.—Mr. Fitzgerald recited some verses in praise of Mr. Pitt, which were encored. The Army and Navy of England followed, with their usual patriotic reception. The Duke of Beaufort then gave the King of Sweden; and Mr. Canning, in the name of the Swedish Ambassador, returned thanks by observing that the spirited conduct of his countrymen, the Swedes, found in the meeting of that day an additional impulse, from the loyalty and patriotism with which the assembly were inspired. Several other toasts were given, which were received with enthusiasm; among them were—"Success to the Spanish nation in their struggles against Bonaparte; and may the Royal Family of Portugal establish in the Brazils that independent empire which they could not preserve in Europe." "May the landed and commercial interests of this country ever continue as united as at present."—The toasts and sentiments given were accompanied with appropriate songs, catches, and glees. "Success to the Administration" being given, the Lord Chancellor returned thanks; but from the occasion of its being the celebration of Mr. Pitt's birth-day, who was his most intimate friend, his feelings overpowered him, and he spoke in a tone so feeble and inaudible, that his utterance was very indistinctly heard. It is calculated that not less than 900 persons, among whom were a number of the nobility, were on this occasion entertained.

The ingredients which compose Ninon de Lenclo's Tooth Powder, have been examined by two eminent Physicians of the Metropolis, and Members of the College, who have approved of its good effects in preserving the enamel, strengthening the relaxed gums, eradicating the scurvy, and causing them to retain their natural colour to the last; it prevents or cures the toothach, stops their decay, fixes those that are loose, has an agreeable taste, and totally expels a bad or offensive breath. This elegant Composition is sold, at 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. a-box (duty included), only by the most respectable Houses; such are, Messrs. Bowlog, Walker, & Co. 36, Blackman-street; Golding, Cornhill; J. Overton, New Bond-street; Bacon & Co. Oxford-street, &c. &c. For general orders, apply to the Proprietors of Ninon de Lenclo's Tooth Powder, at Mr. C. Law's, Bookseller, Ave-Maria-lane.

At last the First Number of the Dramatic Appellant has made its appearance. The plays contained in this Number were rejected by Managers during the course of this season, and the letters of rejection are printed with them. The Barons of Elsenberg and William Tell, two original tragedies, Albert and Rosalie, a melodrama, and The Wager, a musical entertainment, form a highly interesting variety of good pieces, and the sixteen pages of theatrical criticisms, stage sketches, &c. entitled The Panegyrist, will amply gratify the taste of every discriminating reader.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Tuesday, at two o'clock, His Majesty held a private Levee, at the Queen's Palace, which was attended by the usual Officers of State.

The following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:—

Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart, of the First Guards, upon his promotion.

The Bishop of Down, upon his translation to that See.

Admiral, the Earl of Northesk, upon his promotion.

HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH DAY.

Yesterday our gracious and beloved Sovereign entered into the 70th year of his age, with the best wishes of every class of his Majesty's subjects, for a long continuance of that life which is deservedly so precious in the estimation of every good subject:

"Sero in Cœlum redeat!"

The tower and park guns were fired at noon, as usual; and the morning was ushered in by the ringing of bells and other demonstrations of joy.

Their Majesties received the junior part of the Royal Family at Buckingham House in the morning, where they breakfasted, and congratulated their Royal Parent on the return of the day. Soon after one o'clock, the Queen and the Princesses prepared to leave Buckingham House, and they arrived at St. James's at a quarter past two, escorted by a party of Life Guards. Her Majesty was ushered into the Council Chamber by his Grace the Duke of Portland, with whom she conversed for some time. The Princesses formed, as usual, on the left of the Queen, agreeable to seniority. The Lord Chamberlain waved his wand for the performance of the Ode, under the direction of Sir W. Parsons:—

ODE FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY,

BY HENRY JAMES PYE, ESQ. POET LAUREAT.

Not with more joy, when gathering round,
Dark mists the face of Heaven deform;
When howls the wind with hollow sound,
Preluding to the rising storm;
We thro' the severing clouds descry
Of cheering light a golden gleam,
And hail awhile the clearing sky,
And feel awhile the genial beam;
Than now, when spreading wide and far,
Roars the tremendous peal of war,
We bless of peace and joy the ray.
That gilds the happy hours of GEORGE'S Natal Day.

From regions wrapp'd in endless snow,
Eternal Winter's drear domain,
To where Sol's fervid axles glow
Incessant o'er the arid plain,
The Muses look with anxious eye
To see the clouds of discord fly,
That the loud clarion's warlike sound,
Which awes a trembling world, may cease,
And all their tuneful choir around
May strike the lyre to notes of Peace;
The scenes of horror and of death be o'er,
And feel Ambition grasp her iron rod no more.

Vain are their hopes, their vows are vain;
War still protracts his bloody reign;
And when these halcyon hours are past
That lull awhile the stormy blast,
The Muse again, in martial lays,
Must bid her voice the Song of Battle raise;
Must shew that all the joys that smile
On Britain's Heaven-protected Isle,
Call on her Sons with tenfold might
To stem the threatening waves of fight,
Whelm in the ensanguin'd tide their Country's foes,
And guard with giant arm the blessings Heaven bestows.

The performers were Messrs. Sale, Neild, Knyvett, &c. and Mr. Knyvett played the piano forte. Neither the Prince of Wales nor the Princess of Wales had arrived at half past two o'clock, but they were at the Drawing-Room. Her Royal Highness slept at her new residence at Kensington Palace on Friday night, and the Princess dressed there for the Drawing-Room yesterday. After the performance of the Ode, above thirty persons were presented to her Majesty, who continued conversing with the assembly until near five o'clock, when her Majesty retired.

The Drawing-Room was well attended, and the dresses were particularly beautiful. His Majesty was not present. In the evening the public offices, &c. &c. were illuminated as usual.

COURT DRESSES.

LADIES.

HER MAJESTY.

A yellow and silver tissue train, trimmed with blond lace, and the petticoat yellow and silver tissue, covered with blond, and draperies of diamonds; sleeves and body to correspond.

THE PRINCESS OF WALES

Displayed the elegance of her taste in a superb Court train and petticoat of pink and silver tissue, the train richly embroidered with beautiful coloured foil border, and silver bullion forming vine leaves, corn-flowers, and silver shells, interspersed with rich coloured stones; the petticoat fancifully embroidered with foil and silver in wreaths and shells to correspond; the drapery of Brussels point lace, looped up with diamonds, forming roses and stars; the body and sleeves ornamented with point lace and diamonds. The head-dress of diamonds, and ostrich feathers.

DUCHESS OF YORK.

A white crape petticoat, most richly embroidered in Arabic stripes of gold and silver, the ground richly covered with bunches of wheat; the train of rich gold tissue, embroidered in silver; sleeves trimmed with beautiful point lace, and looped up with diamonds; head-dress, a handsome plume of feathers, and a profusion of diamonds.

PRINCESS ELIZABETH.

An amber-coloured sarcenet petticoat, completely covered with a rich silver net, ornamented with antique chains of massy silver, interspersed with double yellow narcissus, and wreaths of silver oak and cyprus; train of amber and silver tissue; head-dress of diamonds and white feathers.

PRINCESS AUGUSTA.

A white crape petticoat, with an elegant border of lilies and cocoa shells, fanciful drapery on the right side, formed of rings and mellons; the left side nearly the same; the middle of silver foiled stripes with spangles; silver border of pine-apples, ornamented with rich silver tassels.

PRINCESS MARY.

A superb dress of silver tissue, richly embroidered with the same. The ground-work of the dress white crape over satin, studded with large silver rings, and terminated with a handsome vermicella border with bouquets of garden grass and Guernsey lilies; the right side of the dress a magnificent drapery of silver tissue, with a massy border of foil shells, fossils, and stones, studded in festoons, from which bunches of oak and acorns were interwoven, and suspended; light drapery tastefully arranged, with handsome borders in scollop; shells formed the coup d œil of this truly elegant and magnificent dress; the whole furnished with handsome cords and tassels. Robe silver tissue, trimmed with silver vandykes, point lace, and diamonds.

PRINCESS AMELIA.

A white satin petticoat richly striped with gold India embroidery; the draperies on the right side richly embroidered with silver, and tastefully ornamented with wreaths of the wings of India flies, supported with sprigs of diamonds; the left side a square drapery to correspond: the bottom of the petticoat richly ornamented with real gold fringe: the whole supported and relieved with real gold cord and tassels; train of white satin, with a border of tissue and gold fringe. Head-dress, a superb turban, in gold, with diamonds and feathers.

PRINCESS SOPHIA OF GLOUCESTER.

A white sarsnet petticoat, richly embroidered with silver, and elegantly ornamented with wreaths of ivy and silver tassels; white sarsnet train, superbly embroidered with silver fringe and wreaths of ivy; head-dress, diamonds and feathers.

Duchess of BEDFORD—White satin and crape with wreaths, and branches of white roses and point.

Duchess of RUTLAND—A most elegant petticoat of white crape, richly embroidered in real gold draperies, embroidered in loma, tastefully looped up with branches of gold hoops; train of rich gold tissue, trimmed with gold fringe; sleeves of point lace, looped up with diamonds; the bosom enriched with diamonds, girdle and stomacher of diamonds, diamond necklace and cross; head-dress of the most beautiful diamond plumes ever seen—the whole had a superb effect, and her grace was particularly noticed at Court.

The Marchioness of DOWNESHIRE—A silver grey satin petticoat, embroidered with a costly silver wheat border, with elegant silver gauze draperies; the train of the same satin as the petticoat, and ornamented the same. Head-dress, a diamond bandeau, with silver grey ostrich feathers.

Countess of CHOLMONDELEY—A petticoat of primrose colour with a drapery of rich lace, tastefully drawn up with diamonds, and numerous plumes of ostrich feathers; body and train of primrose sarsnet, ornamented also with diamonds—the whole forming a dress of that elegant novelty which her ladyship usually displays.

Countess of ORMOND and ORRERY—In an elegant dress of pale blue satin and crape, drapered in a superb style.

Countess of CLARE—A white lace petticoat thrown over yellow sarsnett, beautifully drawn up with draperies, and supported with bunches of libunum; at the bottom a wreath to correspond; body and train of the same trimmed with Brussels point lace; head dress, feathers and diamonds.—The tout ensemble of this dress evinced as usual the peculiar elegance of her Ladyship's taste.

Countess of SELKIRK—A petticoat of rich lilac nett, very beautifully applique, with a nouvelle silver border of shells and sea-weed; on the left side a sash fastened up with a large cluster of the same, from which are suspended massy chains and tassells, at the bottom a border corresponding with the drapery; train and body of lilac nett, trimmed with very fine point, and finished by a border of shells: head dress, feathers, and a profusion of diamonds.—Her Ladyship's dress for taste and elegance was unequalled, and attracted that universal admiration it so justly merited.

Countess of CAMDEN—A yellow satin petticoat, covered with a rich Brussels point lace, with an elegant border; the train of yellow satin; the sleeves ornamented with rich lace.

GENTLEMENS DRESSES.

HIS MAJESTY,

In the morning, wore his review dress, and in the evening, the Windsor uniform.

THE PRINCE OF WALES,

A full dress Field Marshal's uniform.

THE DUKE OF YORK,

A full dress Field Marshal's uniform, and the Order of the Garter.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE,

A dress coat of the 2d regiment of foot guards.

DUKE OF SUSSEX,

In full dress uniform of the North Briton Volunteers.

THE DUKE OF GLOUCESTER,

A dress coat of the 3d regiment of foot guards.

The Duke of GORDON—A blue figured velvet coat and breeches, and embroidered waistcoat.

The Duke of RUTLAND—A regimental suit of the Leicestershire militia, with a very brilliant star.

The Marquis of WATERFORD—A full dress of the Waterford Militia.

Earl of TYRCONNELL—A beautiful rich embroidered Aid-de-camp coat, of the Commander in Chief, and a uniform waistcoat and breeches.

Lord LAKE—A full dress uniform of the 1st regiment of foot guards.

Lord BERESFORD—A full dress uniform of the 2d, or Queen's bays.

Lord DURSLEY—In a most superb dress of the Gloucester militia.

Lord ERSKINE—A dress coat and waistcoat of forest green Marino cloth, lined with white silk, and rich steel buttons, and black silk breeches.

The visit of the Royal Family, on Friday, to the British Museum, being made public, attracted a vast concourse of people. Her Majesty, the Prince of Wales, the Dukes of Cumberland and Cambridge, and the Princesses, arrived in three carriages, about a quarter before one o'clock.—They were received by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Earls of Dartmouth and Aylsford, Lord St. Helens, the Speaker of the House of Commons, Sirs J. Banks, and W. Scott, Mr. Planta, the Librarian, and several others, who conducted the Royal Family to the new wing added to the building, and shewed them the curiosities, with which they appeared highly amused; it is twenty years since her Majesty was there. The Royal Party partook of some refreshments, and left the Museum at three o'clock.

THE THEATRE.

DRURY-LANE.

SIGNORA STORACE—HER FAREWELL-ADDRESS ON RETIRING FROM THE STAGE—HER MANNER OF MAKING HER EXIT—HER GENERAL MERITS AS A SINGER, AND AS AN ACTRESS.

On Monday evening Signora Storace performed the part of Floretta, in Mr. Dibdin's opera of The Cabinet, and after the opera and the string of songs that is so frequently made a part of the benefit entertainments, she came forward to sing an address to the audience on her final retirement from the stage. This musical adieu had been written by Mr. Colman, and was delivered with a good deal of feeling by Signora Storace. In singing the first verse she appeared to be so overcome by her sensibility, that she actually seemed weeping: but the illusion of these tears was destroyed, when in the next verse she had occasion to say,

"No studied tear I've taught to glisten."

If nothing had been said, we might have been deceived: but this assertion betrays itself: and reminds us only of the country boy in Mr. O'Keefe's farce, who having opened a letter directed to his master, delivers it to the old gentleman, saying of his own accord with great earnestness, "I assure you, Sir, I have not "opened it."

However, it is some compliment to the acting of the Signora, that we were at first deceived into a belief that her tears were real. The principal misfortune that she derived from the awkward contrivance that we have been blaming, was that when she came to the conclusion of her address, and was carried off the stage in a swoon by Mr. Bannister and Mr. Braham, a suspicion stole upon the minds of some among the audience, that the swoon was as carefully studied as the tear had been before. Accordingly great disputes arose, whether this swoon were a faint or a feint: and many persons were unable to decide whether the Signora had been very much affected, or only very affected. If the sensibility were not the result of sensibility, but mere acting, then Signora Storace unquestionably kept up the character of an actress most completely to the last moment, and deserves to be praised for adhering to the excellent rule of Qualis ab incepto—but we are rather inclined to think that the feelings which agitated her on taking leave of the stage, joined to the heat of a crowded house, and the exertions which she had gone through in the course of the evening, did really conquer her so far as to render her incapable of supporting herself. She retired amid the universal plaudits of a thronged audience.

Signora Storace has been an actress for a great number of years: and as a singer has, from her early youth, enjoyed a very high reputation. Her voice was strong and clear: and her science has always been held in esteem. With two such assistants, indeed, as the late Mr. Storace, her brother, and the present Mr. Braham, it is no wonder that she has acquired great celebrity for her musical skill. As an actress, she never was particularly good. She had always a want of manner, not to say a vulgarity, which rendered her by no means pleasing on the stage. She mistook boldness for archness, and never knew the point where gaiety borders on ill-breeding. However, in the parts of servants, and in similar characters requiring nothing but confidence, jollity, and good singing, Signora Storace was always a favourite: and though every body must commend her prudence in anticipating rather than yielding to the decay of her powers, and leaving her audience, rather than waiting to be deserted by them, yet we have no doubt but there will be some persons who will regret the loss of so good a singer, and so sprightly an actress.

THE LOAN.

On Tuesday the Gentlemen inclined to bid for the Loan, attended the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at his Office in Downing-street, at ten o'clock. No conversation took place. The Gentlemen merely gave in their Biddings, which were as follow:

Sir Francis Baring and Co.	£118	3	6
Messrs. Robarts and Co.	118	18	0
—— Goldsmid and Co.	118	19	0
—— Walsh and Nisbett	120	10	0
—— Barnes, Ricardo, and Co.	120	14	0

Whereupon Sir Fran. Baring and Co. were declared the highest Bidders. The price they have given is near 2 per cent. above what the highest price of Monday would warrant, so as to allow a profit to the subscribers; notwithstanding which the Omnium was sold at 2 per cent. premium, on its being announced at the Stock Exchange. The bargain is very favourable to the public, who have saved near half a million by the competition of the different lists.

CITY.

Tuesday a Court of Common Council was held at Guildhall, which was numerously attended.

Previous to the Lord Mayor holding the Court, his Lordship ordered the price of Bread to be continued at 11½*d.* the quartern loaf of wheaten, and 10*d.* household.

The Committee appointed to examine the Petition of John Christey, an impressed freeman, reported to the Court the proceedings thereon, which was read and ordered to be printed, and a copy sent to every Member of the Court.

They also reported their proceedings on the case of Nathaniel Young, another impressed freeman, that an application had been made to the Court of King's Bench for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, to bring him up, which the Court refused to grant; upon which a long debate took place, and the Committee were directed to take every step in their power to assert and support the ancient rights and privileges of the Citizens of London.

Same day Sir Thomas Hardy attended at the Chamberlain's Office, Guildhall, where he was presented with the Freedom of the City, and an elegant sword, voted him by the Corporation of London. He was attended by Alderman Shaw, in whose mayoralty the vote of thanks passed, Mr. Alderman Birch and Mr. James Dixon, the mover and seconder, with two other naval captains. The baronet expressed his gratitude to the City of London for the favour conferred upon him.

Friday the Lord Mayor held an especial Court of Aldermen at Guildhall, when the following Gentlemen were elected Rulers of the Watermen and Lightermens' Company for the ensuing year: Messrs. John Hamer, Richard Rowed, Henry Grey, William Devy, Abraham Sanderson, William Chapman, Thomas Blackstone, and James Betts, Water Rulers.—Matthias Lucas, John Finkald, Jun. and Francis Theodore Hay, Lighter Rulers.—Messrs. Hamson, Yates, Jolenstone, and Opey, were re-elected Bendles of the Court of Requests.—A dividend of two per cent to the Orphans, due the 5th of July, was ordered to be paid on the 12th of July next.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

On Tuesday a Court of Directors was held at the East-India House, when the ships Asia and Walthamstow were taken up for India this season; they were ordered to be afloat the 24th instant, sail to Gravesend the 7th of July, and to be in the Downs the 13th of August.

The ships Sir S. Lushington, Ocean, Devaynes, General Stuart, Tottenham, and Union, were ordered to be afloat the 7th of July, and to sail from Gravesend the 7th of August.

The Warren Hastings, Capt. Larkins, was appointed to be in preparation for a voyage to Bengal and China.

Capt. M'Taggart was sworn in to the command of the Ocean. The Court adjourned till Wednesday next.

LAW-REPORT.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, WESTMINSTER, MAY 25.

FREEMEN OF LONDON LIABLE TO BE IMPRESSED IN COMMON WITH THE REST OF THE COMMUNITY.

Mr. Garrow moved for a Writ of Habeas Corpus to bring up Nathaniel Young, an impressed man, he claiming exemption on the ground of his being a Freeman of the City of London. The City of London claimed exemption of their Freemen from Impress, not only upon the immemorial use and understanding that such exemption was secured to them by their Charter, but upon the Grants of the 15th of Edward II. and of Edward III. the former of which set forth, that in consequence of the gratuitous aid afforded his Majesty by the Citizens of London, at the Castle of Leeds, in Kent; such Citizens in future should not be compelled to go out of their walls for the purposes of war, &c.

Lord Ellenborough.—"That grant only means that the Citizens of London having in that instance given voluntary aid to the King, the fact should not establish a precedent for calling them out of their walls on every occasion. I fancy that the Statute of Array, which recognizes the right of the Crown to call out the subjects for the general defence of the Realm, applies as fully to the Citizens of London as to any other class of his Majesty's subjects."

Mr. Garrow said it was a question of great importance to the City, and perhaps the Court would grant a conditional Rule, so as to bring that question fully before the Court.

Lord Ellenborough.—"If, Sir, you could lay before us reasonable grounds for supporting your claim to exemption, then the Court would attend to it; but it is giving a consequence to the application that does not belong to it, to grant a Rule in the absence of such grounds. The Court see nothing in the present case to take the party out of the common liability."

Mr. Justice Grose.—"The exemption claimed would only enable the City of London to sell more freedoms."

Mr. Garrow took nothing by his motion.

MAY 30.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES.

This was an action against the Defendant, the Projector of a new Distillery Company; the case has excited much alarm, because if the allegations could be sustained, a considerable number of beneficial associations, established by the most respectable persons, would be dissolved. The affidavit stated, that one John Baker, clerk to a corn distiller, having seen the Defendant's advertisement of a public distillery company, went to the Defendant's office in 'Change-alley, paid 2 per Cent. for two transferable shares, and obtained a receipt to it. The latter was concerned in the distillery. This Distiller's Clerk conceiving the project illegal, by the Statute of the 6th of George I. afterwards thought proper to promote the interest of his employers by preferring a prosecution against the Defendant for breach of the statute.

Lord Ellenborough delivered the judgment of the Court, in the King v. Dodd. His Lordship said, that the question, which was a very important one, had occupied a considerable portion of their time, and had been fully considered of by the Court. The result of their deliberation was, that the criminal information against the Defendant ought to be granted, and the grounds for thinking so were, first, because the Statute of the 6th of Geo. I. chap. 18, had not been acted upon for 88 years; and secondly, because the person applying for the information did not appear to have been injured, or in the words of the Act "bubbled." The Court, his Lordship said, had looked into the Defendant's prospects for establishing his projected distillery, and they found, amongst other mischievous circumstances, one particularly delusive, namely, that of holding out to the subscribers that they were only liable to the amount of their shares. The Company as between themselves might make such an agreement, but with respect to third persons, the smallest subscriber in the partnership was liable to the full extent of all the debts contracted by the Company in carrying on the concern. One beneficial consequence, his Lordship said, would result from the present decision, namely, that the statute in question would be fully known and comprehended; and probably the mischiefs provided against would be avoided in future. At the same time, if the Officer of the Crown thought proper to interfere in his official character for the existing violations of that statute, the Court were ready to entertain his suit, and the party then before the Court had the power of appealing to the Grand Jury if he thought proper. His Lordship concluded his observations by saying that he wished it clearly to be understood that Companies, such as he was contemplating, were expressly illegal, and that the Defendant must not proceed in his speculation. When he had said that he trusted his observations would operate as a caution to Companies of a similar nature, and prevent them from holding out the like delusion to the public; and the Court were further of opinion, that an increase of such establishments was pregnant with great mischief to society, and could not be countenanced by those whose duty it was to watch over the welfare of the community. His Lordship then ordered the Rule to be discharged without costs.

OLD BAILEY.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1.

This day the Sessions commenced, before Sir Nash Grose, Baron Graham, the Recorder, and City Officers, when 14 prisoners were tried, five of whom were capitally convicted; six were convicted of felony, and three acquitted, but the trials were totally devoid of interest.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.

Margaret Rainey, a dissolute female, living in Parker's-lane, Drury-lane, was capitally indicted for assaulting and robbing Edward Stephens, on the 9th of April, putting him in fear, and forcibly taking from his person a one-pound note and two seven-shilling pieces. The prosecutor stated himself to be a coach-maker, having a wife and five children. He was passing through the lane where the prisoner resided in a cellar, when he was prevailed upon to go in; after some time he found the prisoner's hand in his breeches pocket, and she drew out a one-pound note and two seven-shilling pieces. He struggled with her, and got back one of the seven-shilling pieces, and on demanding the remainder she struck him on the head with a poker, and laid him flat on the ground. When he got up again, he succeeded in geting the poker away; upon which she pulled a knife from her pocket, and swore she would murder him if he did not go about his business. The prosecutor persisted in the struggle to get back his money, when the prisoner blew out the candle, and cried murder, and was drawn through a trap door into the street. The prosecutor was left in the dark by himself. He groped his way up stairs, and got into the street, where he found the prisoner, and gave her in charge to the patrole. The parties were both extremely bloody, the prisoner having torn the prosecutor's face with her nails, and her own arms having been cut in struggling for the knife. On being taken to the watch-house, only sixpence was found upon the prisoner, and the watch-house-keeper being asked by the Judge why he did not search the prisoner's room, replied, "that they were afraid to go, she lived "in such a desperate place."

Mr. Justice Grose observed, that it was highly disgraceful that such a place should be suffered to continue in its present state. This was all the evidence on the part of the prosecution, and the prisoner, in her turn, insisted that she took no money from the prosecutor, and that he attempted to murder her by choaking her. Mr. Justice Grose proceeded to sum up, and observed, that to make it a robbery the prisoner must have taken the money by force; now by the prosecutor's own shewing she took it from his breeches pocket before he was aware of her intention. He was afraid too that a great deal of colouring had been given to the transaction, for if the prisoner was convicted of the robbery, the prosecutor would be entitled to 40*l.* from the county. Besides he presented himself in no very favourable light. A married man, with a wife and five children, frequenting the habitation of infamy, was entitled to no favourable opinion from a Jury. The Jury consulted together and acquitted the prisoner, and the Judge refused the prosecutor his expences.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3.

MURDER.—Sacchaar, Glosse, and Sayou, three Malay seamen, were indicted for the wilful murder of Imambacchus, on the 21th of April, by giving him divers violent blows on the head, of which he languished till the following day, and died. It appeared that the three prisoners and the deceased were drinking together at the Blue Gate public-house, at Shadwell, when Glosse asked Sarah Williams, who was also present, to let him go home with her. She refused, and presently after went out with Imambacchus, with whom she had cohabited some time; Glosse and his two companions followed, a fighting with sticks ensued, and Imambacchus came by his death. Sarah Williams was so drunk at the time, that she could recollect little or nothing that passed on the occasion.

Deamaar, Ismael, and Amear, three of the Lascar tribe of Indians were next examined, and sworn upon an illuminated Alcoran, provided by the East India Company. The ceremony was extremely impressive, for on being told that the book produced was the Koran of Mahomet, they bowed most reverentially over the book, then taking it by turns in their hands, they placed it three times upon their head, removing it from their head to their lips alternately, and at last gave their evidence holding the sacred volume upon their head all the time. Their evidence was translated from the Malay into the Arabick, and from the Arabick into English, so that the trial occupied a most unusual space of time, nearly the whole day.

Mr. Justice Grose said, the Jury had but a very imperfect account of the origin and nature of the quarrel that led to the death of the deceased, and it was difficult for him to say that the blows were not given from sudden provocation. If so, the prisoners were not guilty of murder in the eye of the law, and must be found guilty of manslaughter.

The Jury coincided with the Judge, and found the Prisoners Guilty of Manslaughter.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4.

Isaac Dewberry, committed for ravishing Margaret West, in a stable near Lincoln's-inn-fields, was put to the bar, when Mr. Pooley moved to put off the prisoner's trial till next Session, on account of the unavoidable absence of the surgeon who had attended the young woman during her subsequent illness. The Court acquiesced in the motion.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

THE BRITISH NAVY.—According to the reports up to the present day, there are in commission 800 ships, of which 151 are of the line; 25 from 50 to 44 guns; 174 frigates; 229 sloops of war, 218 gun brigs, &c.

The following Letter was on Friday received at Lloyd's:—

FOWEY, CORNWALL, MAY 31.—A pilot boat of this port being at sea, in Loutick Bay, saw a bottle floating close to her, and, on taking it up, saw a paper in it, which he took out, and found written thereon:

"English Brig Mary and John, lat. 47. 40. long. 5. 25.

"Chased by a fleet of five ships, which captured and burnt the Mary and John, of London, Charles Jephson, Master—took the opportunity of writing this and putting it in a bottle—the Frenchmen all steering E. N. E.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

A shocking accident happened on Wednesday afternoon last, four miles beyond Romford:—As a Gentleman's carriage was driving at a great rate, a cart with a man and his wife in it, who, in pulling up to make way, were thrown over, and unfortunately killed on the spot. They have left nine children to lament their melancholy fate. They were conveyed to the village of Brook for the Coroner's Inquest, which met yesterday. The Gentleman's carriage did not stop, nor were any enquiries made from it about the casualty, but the driver is known.

Early on Thursday morning, as one of the men in the employ of Mr. Rhodes, the cow-keeper, was going to attend the cows in a field at the back of the Queen's Head and Artichoke public house, leading to Camden Town, he found a man, genteelly dressed, who appeared to have been shot; he made the circumstance known, and the body was in a short time after owned by the disconsolate widow of the deceased. He proved to be a Mr. Joachim, of Pratt-place, Camden Town. He left his home in the afternoon to visit Mr. Moss, who resides at Cumberland-place, Lisson-Green, and received some money. When he left Mr. M. he said he was going to Salisbury-place, where he stopped to see some persons play at skittles till a late hour. The report of a pistol and the cry of "Murder!" was heard, at which time it is supposed Mr. Joachim was attacked by some robber, or robbers, and he being a resolute man, had resisted the attack. In corroboration of this, the stick that he had with him was found with some large marks upon it, as if it had given some violent blows. His watch is stolen, and it is supposed he had Bank notes about him to the amount of 100*l.* of which it is conjectured the villains had by some means got information. A surgeon opened the body, and found that a large bullet had entered the left side through the ninth and tenth ribs, and passed through his heart. A Coroner's Inquest was held on the body on Friday, when the Jury brought in a verdict of Wilful Murder against some Person or Persons unknown.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER TWENTY-FOUR.

ON THE CATHOLIC PETITION, AND ITS RECEPTION.

We have pointed out some of the chief advantages to be derived from the Emancipation of the Catholics; let us, in this Number, say a few words of the dangers that attend a continuance of the present system. But first we beg leave to observe, that we do not urge this Emancipation as a certain mode of instantly removing every evil which their degradation has occasioned. The work of good must probably be gradual and slow. A body that has long been the prey of disease, requires a considerable time, even after the malady itself has been expelled, to recover the tone and strength of its former habit. But we must not, therefore, refuse to attempt the cure.

The dangers then, which we have principally to apprehend, are the dangers that must generally threaten every Government that sways by force instead of ruling by justice; and the dangers that in a more particular manner menace this unhappy country, from the insidious attempts of foreign powers. We have to deal with no common enemy; with no puny retailer of half-measures, who begins to-day what he trembles to accomplish to-morrow.—We are not engaged against a foe whom conscience, policy, or cowardice, can withhold from the adoption of those vast plans which he conceives will be conducive to the ends of his own magnificent ambition: he will spare no prejudices of education, he will respect no niceties of religion, he will draw no practical distinction between the professors of one religion and those of another, between religious people and people who have no religion at all. No plea will avail his subjects as an exemption from service: all alike must be called into the actual business of their country's warfare. The English Government has no such summary methods of fortifying itself. We are not, thank Heaven, a nation of slaves, except only in the imaginations of ignorant declaimers: the Ministers cannot yet drag every Englishman from his home, and force him into the operations of their hostility. What then remains for England, what hope is left to her, except the concentration of the largest possible body of British subjects, in opposition to the threats of our enemies? The spirit of the Constitution does not permit us to recruit our military powers by violence: let us then employ conciliation to recruit them, for recruited they must be, or the downfall of England is at hand!

And when at last that awful hour arrives, (against which it becomes every man to provide, however confidently he may look forward to its events) in what part of the United Kingdoms can we suppose that the main attempt of Bonaparte will be made? In England? or in Scotland? or in Wales? No: we have too great a confidence in the natives of those districts, to believe that they would join the foe of their country. They enjoy the Rights of Britons: and those rights are too valuable to be thrown away. All these have something to lose; little to gain. But these are not fit subjects then for the experiments of an enemy; Bonaparte knows that his best chance of assistance must be with those who have nothing to lose, and may gain every thing, and where will he find these people? Why, he will find them among the Roman Catholics of Ireland. The Catholics who petition, desirous of avoiding every thing that can look like a threat to the Government of which they make their request, say nothing of this dangerous disposition among the people: but the enemies of the Catholics are very ready to own it; and that is sufficient for our purpose. We will not here discuss the question: "Would not the Catholics be blameable in joining the Invaders of their country?" because that question has nothing to do with the present affair. We certainly think that they ought by all means to avoid such a step: but we are reasoning now, not from the propriety, but from the probability of their avoiding it. If it appears, and we think it has most fully appeared, that the Catholic Priests, who labour under dreadful restraints and embarrassments, are, on all occasions, eager to stir up revolt among the misguided people whom they govern; if it appears further, that these people are not only goaded by their guides, who cannot brook exclusion from clerical benefits, but stung by their own civil injuries also, surely it becomes us to consider, and to guard against the probable effects of so general an exasperation.

It was the intention of the late Administration, avowed by Earl Grey, then Lord Howick, in his speech in vindication of the principles which had led to the removal of his party from power, to have followed up the measure of Catholic Emancipation by regulations for the improvement of the condition of the Catholics with regard to tythes. There can be little doubt that if to the salutary measure of Catholic Emancipation a relief from the Tythe Laws were superadded, Ireland would rapidly recover her tranquillity. The priests would no longer have a ground for inflaming the minds of the people, and the people would no longer have a pretext for insurrection. Some turbulent spirits must necessarily remain, who would be desirous of continuing the original acrimony: but such persons must gradually become extinct, when a pretence for insurrection was withdrawn: and the mass of the people, who care little for the schemes of tyrants on one hand, or of desperadoes on the other, as long as their humble comforts are not abridged, will not trouble themselves to co-operate with insurgents, nor leave the peace and safety of the spade for the riots of the market-place, or the triumphs of the scaffold.

It is fortunate for the friends of the Catholic cause, that they have a striking and undeniably analogous case already in their favour, we mean the case of Scotland. During the reigns of Charles II. and his successors, the Presbyterians of Scotland, who were, as the Catholics are in Ireland, a large majority of the whole population, not only bore the burthen of an Episcopal Establishment, but endured the most cruel persecutions for their non-conformity. Ancient and hereditary prejudices, prejudices powerful among all nations, but perhaps particularly powerful among the gallant and nobly-spirited Scots, were all in favour of the reigning family: but the persecution was not to be tamely suffered. The peasants were hunted and murdered at their meetings: in revenge, the military force was perpetually thinned by the ambuscades of the exasperated people. As complete a civil war was carried on in Scotland, as lately raged among the Irish: and in all probability the Scotch would not at this day be the subjects of the English King; if the revolution had not restored the allegiance of the oppressed, by removing their grievances. It has been argued that the Catholic Religion is dangerous in its principle, and we shall presently speak of that question: but in the mean time we assert, that there is not more vehemence or plausibility in the arguments of those who maintain the danger of the Catholic spirit, than there was formerly in the arguments of the people who opposed the claims of the Presbyterians, as a class of men, that in every tenet, form, and proceeding, had had proved itself evidently hostile to monarchy. But what has been the result? The Presbyterians were no sooner delivered from persecutions and disabilities, than they became the most loyal subjects of the island. The army and navy are filled with staunch Presbyterians: the descendants of men who struggled against an oppressive government are the warmest defenders of that government now that it has ceased to oppress: and to this day the most devoted adherents of the Court Party are certainly found among the Scotch. Surely this example is most thoroughly analogous: and after reasoning abstractedly on the necessity of relief to the Catholics, and enforcing our reasonings by an instance so directly in point, we shall expect to have some very very strong proof of the dangers to be apprehended from the concession of such relief.

Among the foremost of these proofs are the ecclesiastical decrees that Catholic Councils used to pass, two, or three, or four centuries ago. We should not have believed that any body would have used such an argument, if we had not heard it with our own ears: for what connection there can be between the despotism of a Catholic Establishment three hundred years ago, and the Emancipation of Catholics dissenting from the establishment of the present day, it is difficult to form a conjecture. Are we to be told again about fires in Smithfield? Will men be sacrificed to religion in these times, as they were when religion was only another word for superstition? Is there any resemblance between the dispositions of the people in the two periods of which we speak? Is there any resemblance in the customs of society? If there be any argument that for a moment can make one think the renewal of religious martyrdoms a probable event, that argument is certainly the bigotted barbarity with which the Catholics of Ireland have been treated. We, we, the Protestants, are the oppressors: we are the upholders of intolerance: we are the friends of persecution, and the perpetrators of animosity! If the Catholics cannot be trusted as allies, they cannot be trusted as subjects: why do we allow, in the heart of our country, the existence of a body, whom we believe, from the inherent vices of their religious faith, to be persons unsafe amid plenty itself, and ungrateful even in the fullness of indulgence? Why do we not at once exterminate a race of beings so dangerous to our properties, our liberties, and our lives? Because we know that they are dangerous, not from nature but from circumstance: we know that the Catholics, when their grievances shall be redressed, can no longer have a motive for hating us. When we have given them what they ask, and placed them on a level with ourselves, where is the further danger? They will see nothing more to fight against us for. If they were governed by a Catholic King, they could but procure the ways of power and honour to be laid open to them, and if those ways are laid open by us, a Catholic succession is no longer a matter to be coveted by them. For as to the other idle notion that we so often hear, a notion that the Catholics wish to murder all the Protestants in the King's dominions, by way of getting their property, we should be glad to know how their Emancipation would facilitate such a scheme, even if they were mad enough to wish it. Or thus: The Catholics would hold commissions on [illegible], and be able to turn the arms of the country against the country itself. But already the Catholics have been permitted to hold situations in the army, by their own act of 1793, which enables a Catholic regiment to act in Ireland, where the seat of all the discontents is supposed to be; it is in England that such regiments must not be seen. This is politic indeed! But even if the foes of the Catholics would allow them to hold subordinate commissions in England, they never would consent to admit them to the staff. A man of courage and skill is pointed out to the King as a person fit to be trusted with a high command. He has proved alike his patriotism and his ability, and he is about to be promoted, when suddenly he is discovered to be a Catholic. Promote a Catholic! impossible. He has fought in defence of his country, at the head of a regiment, but give him an army, and he directly fights against her. And of course the whole army, touched as it were by a stroke of magic, go over to the same way of thinking, and join their new leader to burn all the Protestants alive! And all for the love of the Pope, to whom they must needs be so much attached. And the Pope will help Bonaparte and them to overthrow England; because the Pope has so much reason to love Bonaparte, and has so great a power in raising recruits. To be sure he never thought of employing his power among his Catholic friends in Ireland when Bonaparte overthrew his dominions: but though he did not call out the Catholics for his own use, he will be certain to call them out for the use of Bonaparte!

And these are the dangers which deter us from restoring Britons to their rights! In our next number we will conclude our observations on this question.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL PAMPHLETEERS.

No. XXIV.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK'S PAMPHLET ON THE NECESSITY OF A MORE EFFECTUAL SYSTEM OF NATIONAL DEFENCE, AND THE MEANS OF ESTABLISHING THE PERMANENT SECURITY OF THE KINGDOM.

We have so often had occasion, in our Review of Political Declaimers, to creep among brambles, and work a laborious way, that we are particularly happy when an occasion presents itself of marching along a good regular high road. Though in former Numbers we have been obliged to blame, we are almost entirely relieved from that necessity in the present instance; and we are eager to recommend Lord Selkirk's pamphlet, as one of those broad, useful, and even admirable systems which have but seldom been offered to the government of any country, and which being offered in these times of difficulty and danger, appear to deserve a more than ordinary consideration.

The first section of this pamphlet treats of the inadequacy of our present state of defence.

The second proposes an organization of local militia upon a new and extensive principle.

The third demonstrates the advantages which such an institution is likely to produce for the security of the kingdom.

The fourth enters into a comparison of this local militia with the volunteer system, and with the plan proposed for a general array.

The fifth suggests a measure for the defence of Ireland: and contains a general disquisition on the militia establishment of these kingdoms.

In the last, and concluding section, the expence of the plan here proposed is discussed, and with some general observations the body of the work is then terminated. There is an Appendix containing tables, calculations, and other details.

In the prefatory advertisement the Noble Earl apologizes for discussing some military topics, without having had direct experience of such affairs: but he declares his reasonings have received the sanction of men highly distinguished for their military talents. He also deprecates a confusion between the local militia proposed in this pamphlet, and the local militia instituted by Lord Castlereagh.

As this publication has excited a more unusual, but not unrerited interest, we are sure that our Readers will rejoice in receiving an account of it; and we therefore subjoin an analysis of the principal reasonings, together with such observations as it may seem necessary for us to add, in our capacity of Reviewers.

There are in this kingdom a great number of persons, who deem our naval superiority to be so infallible a safeguard, as to place us beyond the necessity of any military provision at home. Lord Selkirk argues most forcibly against such a hypothesis: and he cites the authorities of Lord Nelson and Sir Sydney Smith. It is indeed perfectly true that invasion has often been threatened, and never seriously attempted, and we are among the number of those who think invasion an event by no means probable; but we do not go the length of declaring that we think it by any means impossible. A successful invasion of England would not be at all more extraordinary than many other of the great political events which the last few years have set before our eyes. Four years ago, invasion was less probable than it is now: for at that time Bonaparte must have risked both his power and his personal safety on the success of the enterprize: now his situation is such, that neither of these two great objects will be staked, and neither, of course, will suffer by a failure. We are opposed against an enemy, who not only bears to us a hatred the most rancorous and implacable, but possesses a genius the most magnificent, a force the most formidable, every advantage, in short, and every motive, that can render hostility tremendous, and teach Great Britain the necessity of exerting every muscle to its highest tension. No sacrifices will be deemed too great, if they can purchase our destruction: the lives of an hundred thousand men will be estimated as an inconsiderable price: and to an enemy thus desperately determined, it is but too probable that some opportunity must occur.

We are certainly inclined to place a strong reliance on the maritime force of Great Britain: but we see the difficulties that may fall in the way of our naval exertions. Not only may our fleets, by contingencies of weather, be disabled from intercepting the passage of the enemy, but it may by some unfortunate accident occur, that bad judgment may prevent the proper operations of those fleets. English Admirals are not apt to neglect or mistake their duty; but instances of error have been known, and when the misconduct of one man, the mismanagement of a single day, may open our country to that foe who has already overrun the Continent, we cannot think it unnecessary to provide ourselves against the consequences of invasion.

"Since then," says Lord Selkirk, "the obstacles to the passage of the enemy are not physically insuperable, it is at least "a possible supposition that they may succeed in landing an "army of 100,000 men on the coast of Kent or Essex. It becomes us to consider coolly whether our means of defence are "now sufficient to afford a certainty or even a fair probability, "that we may overcome such an invading force. No one I "presume, will venture to assert, that our regular forces are "adequate to the contest, even with the addition of the militia. "Of the numerous army maintained by this kingdom a great "part is detached into distant colonial stations, while those at "home have so extensive a tract to guard, that there is much "difficulty in collecting any considerable number in one place."

It would therefore, (as Lord Selkirk argues at greater length than we can afford to do in our narrow limits) it would therefore be probably the wish of our commanders to avoid a decisive action. But in a small country highly cultivated like England, protracted warfare could not be as successful as it sometimes has proved itself to be in an extensive territory thinly inhabited, and full of forests, morasses, or mountains: so that our army would most likely be unable to avoid an engagement for any very long while. The regular force being thus insufficient, we must rest our hopes on the support that our army may obtain, from the voluntary zeal of the nation at large. We are willing to hope that the nation at large are not yet convinced by their demagogues, that they have nothing to fight for. He then argues thus:—

"In the history of the most courageous nations in the world, instances are recorded of the effects of panic; and what is so likely to produce a sensation of this nature, as a state of things so unusual; one which the people are not prepared to meet, one which of late years they have even been sedulously taught to believe remote from all probability? If the struggle were to be of long duration, the inherent spirit of the nation might overcome every disadvantage; Britain has had her Alfred and her Wallace: and such would yet again appear, if the circumstances of our times were similar; but we have not now to expect a protracted struggle. We have an antagonist rapid and decisive in his movements, vigilant to preserve every advantage which he gains; and before the nation "would have time to discover around whom they might rally "with confidence, the struggle would be at an end. Against an "enemy such as we have to contend with, the natural resources "of the country can be of little avail, unless they be in full readiness for immediate employment."

It is on the necessity of this constant readiness that Lord Selkirk seems chiefly to ground the arguments for that excellent plan which he then proceeds to disclose, and which we shall lay before our readers in the next Number of THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH AND GOTTENBURGH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, MAY 25.—On Monday, at noon, the King and Queen of Spain arrived at Fontainbleau, accompanied by the Prince of Peace and a numerous retinue. Every preparation was made for their reception, under the direction of the Prefect of the Imperial Palace, and the Inspector of the Houshold of the Crown, both of whom had arrived at Fontainbleau a few days before, to give the necessary orders. A squadron of Horse Chasseurs, and a detachment of the Imperial Foot Guards, had also arrived some days before; and, notwithstanding the present time of the year is not the proper season for hunting, the Emperor, who knows the predeliction of his Royal Guests for this enjoyment, has sent the whole Imperial hunting etât to Fontainbleau.

Their Majesties reside in the apartments intended for the King and Queen of Holland, and known under the appellation of the Pope's apartments. It is in the same part of the palace where Charles V. lodged in 1559, when he passed through France to quell the insurrection at Ghent.

The Prince of Asturias and his brother Don Carlos arrived on the 19th inst. at the Castle of Valencey, belonging to the Prince of Benevento, and situated in the department of Indre, at five leagues distance from the town of Loureux.

Several persons of the first rank rode to Fontainbleau, yesterday, to pay their respects to the King of Spain.

In the sea-ports the following decree has been published, which was issued by the Emperor at Bayonne, on the 20th of April:—

"Napoleon, Emperor of the French, &c. considering that the French ships, have, for a long time past, not found any safety or protection on the coast of Sardinia; that several of their vessels have been captured by English ships of war and privateers, in sight of the Sardinian shore, without any exertion being made on the part of the Government to cause its neutrality to be respected by the enemy; that English privateers are publicly fitted out in Sardinia; that the warehousing of provisions for Malta and Gibraltar is constantly permitted there; that the Sardinian Government, after having engaged, by an agreement concluded on the 10th November, to make good all violations, and to prevent them for the future, has absolutely refused to fulfil its engagements: we have decreed, and it is hereby declared, that an embargo shall be laid upon all Sardinian ships in the ports of our dominions, and of the countries occupied by our armies."

It is asserted that Marshal Kellerman has obtained the title of the Duke of Valmy, after the village in Champagne, whence, in 1792, he compelled the Prussian army to retreat.

MAY 26.—The letters from Madrid, of the 14th instant, state, that the hot weather having set in, has rendered the encamping of the French troops impracticable. Several large houses and public buildings were preparing at Madrid, to serve as barracks.

In old Castile, of which his Excellency Marshal Bessieres is Governor, all is quiet.

Twelve Portuguese regiments are on their march to Bayonne. The first regiment of Portuguese cavalry had already arrived there on the 21st instant, and passed in review before his Imperial Majesty. The said corps d'armée is commanded by the Marquis d'Alorna, and will proceed to Languedoc to receive a new organization, and then to be employed on an important expedition, together with an equal number of French troops.

This day the heart of Marshal Vauban was conveyed to the Church of the Invalids, in military state, and placed in the tomb there erected for him.

The Persian Ambassador, who is shortly expected at Paris, is loaded with valuable presents from his Sovereign for the Emperor Napoleon: amongst them are two sabres, one of which belonged to Tamerlane, and the other to Nadir-Shah; 200 Cashmere shawls, a carpet of the same stuff, and a casket with pearls, jewels, rubies, and diamonds.

MAY 29.—They write from Bayonne, the 23d instant, that his Majesty the Emperor and King had set off on the preceding day for St. Jean de Luz. The Emperor had visited the port and the old fortifications, and minutely inspected every thing.

The Colonel, Prince Wolkonsky, Adjutant to the Emperor of Russia, is on his way to France, being charged with a special mission from his Sovereign to the Emperor Napoleon. Four waggons, loaded with the presents which the said Emperor sends to our Monarch, arrived at Frankfort on the 24th of this month, accompanied by Lieutenant Prozinsky.

No one can be mistaken with respect to the views of the English Government, when it caused to be inserted in its daily papers of the 30th of April, that an insurrection had broken out in St. Petersburgh, and that the Emperor Alexander was either killed or sent into confinement. It is easy to perceive, that the English Ministers, being excluded from all communication with Russia, want to make people believe, that they still preserve some relations there, and for that reason they make mention of calamities which have not the least foundation. We should think it an insult to the reader, seriously to give the lie to such fictions. At Paris we receive, every day, letters from St. Petersburgh; and every thing announces, that the greatest tranquillity prevails in those countries, that there exists no faction whatsoever, and that the Emperor of Russia bears the sole away of his extensive dominions.

General Dupont has been appointed Governor of Cadiz.

SPAIN.

MADRID, MAY 2.—Murat has published the following Proclamation to the Spaniards on the events that lately took place in this capital:—

BRAVE SPANIARDS,

The Second of May will be a day of mourning as well for me as for yourselves.

Our common enemies having first provoked me in a manner to wear out my patience, have concluded by exciting a part of the people of Madrid and of the adjacent villages to such excesses, that in the end it has been necessary to employ the irresistable force confided to my command.

I was previously informed of the efforts of the ill-intentioned, but I still wished to persuade myself that nothing would disturb the public tranquillity. I was prepared for the worst, but still trusting that my precautions would be superfluous. This morning the storm I had long apprehended has burst, A number of circumstances and incendiary libels had prepared me for it, by informing me of the means that had been employed to mislead the populace. The signal for the blow was the departure of the Queen of Etruria and the Infant Don Francisco, who were called to Bayonne by the King their father. One of my aid-du-camps, who was at the time in the Palace, was on the point of perishing by the hands of the seditious, at the same time all the French who were found alone in the different quarters of Madrid were assassinated. I was at last compelled to give orders to punish such enormous offences.

With what horrible joy will the enemies of France and Spain contemplate a day in which generous Frenchmen were compelled to wound deluded Spaniards. The common enemies of both countries will continue to use their efforts to obtain other triumphs, not less horrible, in other parts of this beautiful kingdom. Their futile hopes shall be frustrated through my frankness and your sound judgment. Brave Spaniards, I speak to you with sincerity, upon an event not less painful to your bosoms than to mine; and at the same time I will explain to you your situation. Charles the Fourth and his Son are now met together at Bayonne, with the Emperor Napoleon, to settle the fate of Spain. The Emperor does not think proper to wait the issue of such a momentous decision, to make known to you the feelings that animate him in behalf of a magnanimous nation, which he is desirous of preserving from a revolutionary crisis; and to call on her to establish such political institutions as are best adapted to her character.

He therefore assures you, and charges me to repeat to you, that he wishes to maintain and secure the integrity of the Spanish Monarchy, which shall not be dismembered of the slightest part of its territory; it shall not even lose a village, nor suffer any of the contributions, the levy of which are authorised by the laws of war in conquered countries, but which the ill-intentioned only will suppose applicable to an Ally.

Will you not unite, brave Spaniards, with me, to prevent the evil-minded from disturbing such a happy prospect. I will not suppose you capable of such blindness, as to suffer yourselves to be misled by [illegible], who wish to conduct you to your [illegible]

When the public repose is the object of our care, is not the interests of the army which I command also that of those who have dignities and properties to preserve? Do not the disturbances of the multitude, which insult the majesty of the laws, threaten both.

Noblemen, Proprietors, Merchants, Manufacturers, use your greatest influence to prevent every species of sedition, this exercise of Magistracy is the right and duty of your station.

Ministers of Religion—your duty calls upon you to stem the delusion of the people, because you know the secrets of their consciences, which your voices direct with so much authority.

Depositaries of the Civil and Military Power—the most direct responsibility lies on you, if you neglect using your power, with vigour, to crush sedition in its cradle, or to check it in its first movements.

If French blood should be spilt again, you in particular shall be accountable to the Emperor Napoleon, whose wrath or clemency no one ever provoked in vain. Your weakness would be the more inexcusable, after I have recalled to your memory, with the greatest diligence and earnestness, the most important duty which you have to fulfil.

But I promise myself a better futurity, trusting that the Ministers of Religion, the Magistrates, Spaniards of the highest rank, in one word, that all Classes will endeavour to avoid the disturbances that might be prejudicial to the improvement of Spain. To all General Officers and Military Men employed in the different Provinces of the Monarchy, the conduct of which has been observed by the troops of the Royal Houshold, and of the garrison of Madrid, and the Spanish military quartered in the Court, is a model worthy of imitation on this lamentable occasion. Should my hopes be frustrated, my vengeance will be indeed tremendous; but if realized, I shall be happy in announcing to the Emperor, that his judgment respecting the natives of Spain (to whom he extends his esteem and affection) has not been erroneous.

Head Quarters, Madrid, the 2d May, 1808.

(Signed) JOACHIM,

By his Imperial and Royal Highness the General of the Staff

AUGUSTIN BELLIARD.

SWEDEN.

STOCKHOLM, APRIL 5.—Bernadotte is said to have, in his conferences with the King of Denmark, heavily complained of his remissness in completing the warlike preparations in Zealand, and adding, that as he did not find any of the measures carried into effect, which were indispensably required for the execution of the plan with which he was charged, he should not only quit Zealand, but also Funen, and retire to Colding, in Jutland.

MAY 25.—His Majesty received yesterday the following Report from Major-General Baron Anckarsward, touching the transaction in the Isle of Gothland:—

"I received this moment by Assessor Dublee, a Report from Admiral Baron Cederstrom, that your Majesty's fleet, consisting of three sail of the line, two frigates, two armed brigs, the yacht Fortuna, and several transports, dropped anchor on the 14th instant in Sandwich Road, and that the same evening, the Swedish troops, infantry and artillery, were disembarked. On the following day, the 15th, a Swedish flag of truce arrived in Wisby, with the annexed articles of capitulation, which were signed on the 16th. The Swedish vanguard, composed of chasseurs, entered the town the 17th, as the Russian troops had already marched to Slito. The Chief of Brigade, Lieut.-Colonel Baron Fleetwood, marched with the main body to Slito, on account of the Russians having, contrary to the capitulation, spiked several guns, spoiled a large quantity of gunpowder, and not paid the debts which they had bound themselves to discharge. The 18th, Admiral Baron Cederstrom intended to weigh anchor and proceed to Slito, in order to prevail on Admiral Bodisco to fulfil the terms of the capitulation."

[The articles of capitulation state, that the Russians were to retire in two days, and not to serve against Sweden for twelve months. They were also to surrender their arms.]

The Russian troops who were made prisoners of war, in the Isle of Gothland, consisted of 62 officers, 78 non-commission officers, 999 rank and file, and 64 artillery men.

MAY 28.—His Majesty has received a Report from General Baron Armfeldt, Commander in Chief of the Western Army, dated Head-quarters, Holmedal, 20th inst. stating, that the first brigade of the right wing were attacked on the 18th inst. by the enemy, far superior in number; but that, nevertheless, the Danish troops were repulsed with considerable loss, and that our army in Norway still maintains its former position.

GOTTENBURGH, MAY 30.—Some persons arrived here to-day from Hamburgh, which they left on the 14th instant, state, that the last English letters, which were brought thither from Heligoland, were not only seized, but the persons to whom they were addressed arrested, and the bearers of them hanged. All intercourse with England and Sweden was forbidden upon pain of death. The English expedition, commanded by Sir John Moore, still lies in our harbour, waiting orders from England. A few days since, the Tribune frigate sailed hence with a convoy for the Baltic, three of which were taken by the Danish gun-boats near the Sound. By advices from Konigsberg, received to-day, we learn, that the whole Prussian army is nearly disbanded, and that the soldiers have retired to their homes: not more than 5,000 men remain of this once great and flourishing force.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, MARCH 30.—According to public notice given to the States of Hungary, the cordon of Austrian troops to be formed on the Turkish frontiers west of Turkish Croatia, is to extend from the Saxe and Danube, to Transylvania, and from thence in a Northward direction by Buckonina to the frontiers of Gallicia, as the great extent of the cordon requires a much larger corps than was at first destined on that service; several other regiments have received orders to join it. General Duka arrived at Temeswar, where he has established his head-quarters; Field Marshal Bellegarde, Commander in Chief of the cordon, is also shortly expected.

TUSCANY.

LEGHORN, MARCH 19.—An official letter from Palermo, of the 19th February, states, that the Court has ordered all Danish ships to be sequestrated, and the rudders taken out, after the necessary search had been made. The masters and crew obtained leave to come on shore. The former were left at liberty, and the latter sent to the citadel. The Danish Consul, having inquired into the cause of this proceeding, received for answer, that it was found necessary to adopt the measure against the Danes, on account of their being in alliance with France.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 8.

This day the House met pursuant to adjournment. After some private Bills were brought from the Commons, and some routine business transacted, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9.

MAJOR BLAND'S DIVORCE.

THE CHANCELLOR this day delivered the judgment of the House upon Major Bland's application for a divorce from his wife, upon the ground of her adultery. His Lordship took an elaborate view of all the facts in the case, and while he considered the adulterous conduct of the wife, he said it was impossible to overlook that of the husband, who was himself living in a systematic course of adultery previous to his wife's disgrace and his own dishonour. His Lordship also inferred, that it was necessary that a husband, before he obtained a divorce, should not only prove his wife's adultery, but that his own conduct was such as to entitle him to their Lordships consideration and interposition. His Lordship concluded with expressing his opinion, that the Bill ought to be rejected.

The question was then put, and the House concurring in his Lordship's opinion, the Bill was thrown out.

The Bills on the table were then forwarded in their respective stages, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 10.

A Message was delivered from his Majesty, informing the House, that he had concluded a Treaty of subsidy and alliance with his Sicilian Majesty; and that copies of the Treaty were laid upon the table.

The Orders in Council Warehousing Bill, the new Irish Glebe House Bill, and the Woolwich Water-works Bill, were severally committed, and the Bills on the table forwarded in their respective stages.

After some further routine business the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 8.

The Pilchard Fishery Bill, and the Copper Duty Bill were passed and ordered to the Lords.

Ordered, on the motion of Mr. Rose, that the House do resolve itself into a Committee, to consider of the trade to the Cape of Good Hope and the Southern Whale Fishery.

Mr. Brand presented a Petition from Major Cartwright, against the Local Militia Bill, stating at length that it infringed on the rights and liberties of the subject, and praying that it may not pass into a law. Ordered to be laid on the table.

SUPPLY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee, Mr. Wharton in the Chair, and voted, on the motion of Mr. Huskisson, the following sums:—

68,760*l.* for Secret Service Money,
54,000*l.* for the Buildings on Tower-hill.
1,913*l.* for Salaries of Officers of the House of Lords and Commons, for the Session 1808.
6,000*l.* for bringing Fish to the London market, 51,000*l.* for Inland Navigation in Scotland.

The following sums were afterwards voted:—

12,100*l.* for Public Works done to both Houses of Parliament, 5,000*l.* for extra Messengers.
3,000*l.* for the Board of Agriculture.
1,000*l.* for the Veterinary College.
9,500*l.* for Printing and making an Index to the Journals, for 1808.
20,000*l.* for the suffering Clergy and Laity of France, for 1808, and 22,000*l.* for Repairing and Building Forts on the Coast of Africa.

Mr. Dundas deferred his motion respecting a Loan to the East India Company, from Friday till Monday next, in consequence of the report on the subject not being ready.

PLYMOUTH DOCK POLICE.

Mr. Tyrwitt moved "for leave to bring in a Bill to enable his Majesty to establish a Police in Plymouth Dock."

Leave was given to bring in the Bill.

IRISH BUDGET.

MR. FOSTER said, he would call the attention of the House to a brief statement of the Finances of Ireland, for the year beginning at the 1st of January. He then proceeded to state the expences of Ireland, including the interest of the funded debt, at 9,767,000*l.* the ordinary revenue he took at 4,800,000*l.* There was, he observed, 2,700,000*l.* to be borrowed for Ireland, which, with the money to be advanced by the Irish Bank for its charter, would make a sum of 9,768,000*l.* leaving a surplus of 68,000*l.* He then proceeded to state the terms of the loan contracted for Ireland, in the three and a half per cents. which were the same as the terms of the contract for the loan in this country. He next stated that frauds were committed in the distilleries in the malt duties, as the distillers used raw barley, and therefore he would propose laying a duty on that, and regulating the duties paid per gallon on Irish spirits; and concluded by moving a long string of resolutions. The resolutions were agreed to.

The House then proceeded to the other Orders of the Day, and adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9.

Mr. Ashley Cooper presented an account of the Ordnance and Stores taken at Copenhagen, and their condition, which was laid on the table.

Mr. Lethbridge brought up the report of Mr. Palmer's Annuity Bill, to which Mr. Bankes moved an amendment, and strangers were ordered to withdraw, a division being called for but we understand that the House did not divide, and after a long conversation, while the gallery was shut, the report was agreed to, and the Bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Long moved the Annual Account respecting the British Museum, of the number of persons, from June to January 1808 which was ordered accordingly.

The report having been brought up by the Chairman of Committee on Mr. Palmer's account, it was ordered to be printed.

Sir Thomas Turton gave notice, that he would move against Mr. Palmer, agreeably to the report, in the Committee of the whole House on Monday.

Mr. Western brought in a Bill for the protection of the Fisheries, which was read a first time, and was ordered to be read a second time on Monday, and printed.

Mr. Beresford presented a Petition from certain Protestants Freeholders and others, in the County of Waterford, in favour of Catholic Emancipation.

Mr. Jenkinson presented a Petition from the Dover Pilots against the Pilot Bill now before the House, and praying to be heard by their Counsel, which was ordered.

Mr. Rose deferred the consideration of the report on the Bill till Monday next.

ALTERATIONS IN WESTMINSTER.

Mr. Long brought up the report of the Committee, appointed to consider of improving the access to Westminster Hall, which stated that they had investigated various plans, and it was necessary to complete the improvements, that a sum of 75,000*l.* should be voted to purchase houses and grounds East and West of the Hall. The report was ordered to be printed.

VACCINATION.

Mr. Rose said, he rose pursuant to the notice he had given, to bring the subject of Vaccination before the House, and to submit a proposition for the extension of the best virus, as much mischief was done by inoculating with spurious and bad matter. A circumstance occurred some time ago at Ringwood, of persons who had been vaccinated, who were said to have afterwards taken the small-pox—as the report had gone abroad, he thought it necessary to have the matter investigated, which was done with patience and attention at the suggestion of an hon. friend of his and himself. It appeared that in one lot, 17, who had been vaccinated, took the small-pox ten or eleven weeks afterwards, and died. In consequence of this circumstance he wrote to the Jennerian Society, not knowing at the time that there was any other society for vaccination, and gentlemen of professional eminence went to Ringwood and enquired into the business. It appeared to them, after patient investigation, that the patients had undergone vaccination with spurious and imperfect matter, and therefore it occurred to him, that it became an object worthy the attention of the House, to have a national institution for providing the public at large with pure and good matter. He understood that there were two other instances of a similar nature, and on enquiry he found that the subscriptions to the Jennerian Institution had so fallen off that they had not the means of providing vaccine virus for all those who applied to the Establishment. He then proceeded to read the report of the Royal College of Physicians on vaccination, and the communication made to them from the Royal Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons in Dublin and Edinburgh. The College of Physicians stated generally that it was safe, and that out of 100,000 persons vaccinated, but five took the small-pox; that there was no reasonable objection to vaccination, and therefore recommended it as highly beneficial to the public. The College of Surgeons estimated, that there was a failure in the proportion of one to three hundred, but contented themselves with stating facts without recommending vaccination. He had himself known an instance where a child, that had been vaccinated by a Surgeon of eminence, took the natural small-pox. His object was not to oblige any person to inoculate with the vaccine matter, but to supply those who preferred it, to have it good and genuine. He therefore concluded by moving the following Resolution:

"That this House having taken into its consideration the Report of the Royal College of Physicians, and the communications made by the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons in Dublin and Edinburgh, is of opinion that great benefit would arise from the establishment of a central Institution in the City of London, under the direction of a certain number of the Royal College of Physicians, for the purpose of Vaccination, and that they should have the appointment of persons to be employed for that purpose."

Mr. Fuller seconded the motion.

Mr. Rose said, the establishment was for the purpose of extending genuine vaccine matter, and would not be attended with more than an expence annually of 1500 or 2000*l.*

Mr. Fuller observed, that in Calcutta, Bengal, and Madras the small-pox was unknown since the introduction of vaccination. The Bramins previous to its introduction used to inoculate annually, and spread devastation around. The object of his Bill was to prevent the spreading the disease.

The motion of Mr. Rose was at length put and agreed to.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 10.

MESSAGE FROM THE KING.

Mr. Canning delivered a Message to the following effect from his Majesty:—

"G. R.—His Majesty thinks it proper to acquaint the House of Commons, that he has entered into a Treaty of Alliance and Subsidy with his Sicilian Majesty, and that he had directed the same to be laid before the House, and trusted that it would enable his Majesty to make good the engagements contained therein."

Mr. Canning laid a Copy of the Treaty before the House, which he said would be printed and ready for delivery in the course of the evening, and gave notice that he would move that his Majesty's Message be referred to a Committee of Supply. He took the present opportunity of informing the House, that the treaty was not a new transaction. It commenced with the former Administration, who thought, under the circumstances of the time, that it was necessary to grant a subsidy of 300,000*l.* to his Sicilian Majesty, and the present treaty was the completion of the business.

Mr. Rose brought in a Bill for regulating the trade between Great Britain and the Portuguese Settlements in South America, which was read a first time.

SPAIN.

Mr. Sheridan gave notice that he would on Monday make a motion on a subject that required explanation. It was a matter of general notoriety that an important communication had been recently made to his Majesty's Ministers from Spain. It was the object of his motion to receive some information on the subject, but he would not require any that they might deem improper to grant.

LICENCED PUBLICANS.

Mr. Sheridan rose for the purpose of moving for leave to bring in Bill to explain and amend the 32d of the King, as far as related to the granting Licences to Victuallers and Publicans. He embraced the present opportunity of calling the attention of the House, to a meeting of gentlemen, which had been held for the purpose of regulating the price of posting, held at a place of great political notoriety, and at which meeting none but Lords and Commoners were admitted. He was an enemy to this new Parliament, where persons associated, and held out men to public odium as being guilty of fraud, who did not comply with its regulations; such meetings ought to be discouraged by those who passed the Act against Journeymen, for combining to raise the price of wages, while this new Parliament combined against men for charging what they thought fair and equitable. The Bill which he proposed, was for the relief of Publicans who were grieviously oppressed, by having their licences taken away without any reason assigned; and if he was informed correctly, one of the Members for Sussex held out a threat, that those Publicans who did not agree to the terms proposed by this newly created Parliament, should have their licences taken away. He concluded by moving "For leave to bring in a Bill to explain and amend the Act of the 32d of the King, as far as related to the granting of Licences to Victuallers for the sale of wine, ale, or spirits."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that the Right Hon. Gentleman had said a good deal on other subjects, but scarcely any thing with respect to the motion before the House. He had given notice the last Session that he would bring in his Bill early the present, but he thought proper to defer it until this late period, and therefore he must object to his motion, as there would not be time to have the Bill printed and sent to the Magistrates in the country, so as any steps could be taken during the present Session.

Mr. Sheridan said there was no objection made to the principle of the Bill, and he was therefore surprised at the resistance given by the Right Hon. Gentleman. The publicans, it was said, could have recourse, if aggrieved, to the Court of King's Bench, but such application would be nugatory, as the Magistrate was not bound to assign any reason for taking away a licence, and the Magistrate could not be convicted without he assigned a reason, and that reason was considered insufficient by the Court. As to the idea that the Session was far advanced, that was paltry in the extreme, as Ministers were bringing Bills in daily, and there was business sufficient before the House to keep it sitting till Michaelmas. There was one object of the Bill which every Gentleman would approve, which was, that no brewer should be suffered to let a house to a publican. He would not press the House to a division on his motion, but withdrew it, on throwing out this challenge to Ministers, that they would agree to a Committee of Enquiry next Session, he would pledge himself to substantiate the facts.

The Order of the Day being read for the second reading of the Muriatic Acid Bill, it was opposed by Mr. Fuller and Sir John Newport, who wished it to be deferred till next Session, which was agreed to by Mr. Hiskisson.

LOCAL MILITIA BILL.

Lord Castlereagh moved the third reading of the Local Militia Bill. Some new clauses were proposed to the Bill, which were agreed to, and others negatived.

The Speaker put the question, that the Bill should then pass; when

Mr. Windham made a very long and eloquent speech, wherein he contrasted the different provisions of his Bill with those of Lord Castlereagh's Bill, and maintained, that the new system was a complication of absurdity, and inefficient in its operation.

Sir Francis Burdett considered the Bill oppressive and harassing to the public, and incapable of producing any beneficial effect. The Bill ought to be called a Bill of pains and penalties; it enacted eleven new penalties, besides subjecting the people to imprisonment and transportation. When the House considered this to be a measure to secure the country against the influence of the Emperor of France, with a population of two hundred and forty millions, a force double the population of the British Islands, the measure must appear inadequate. The state of the country required some means of organizing the population, to give it a chance of defeating the danger that threatened. It could not be safe to trust to a standing army, because such means of defence had failed in other countries. He did not know to what cause the late conquests of France over the world were attributable; or the conquests of the Romans of old, unless they were owing to loss of public liberty; and he concluded, that the despotism which prevailed in conquered countries, previous to subjugation, occasioned them to be easily overcome. From these reflections it was obvious to him that we ought not to depend on military force. When he saw tax-gatherers swarming through the land, and the present Bill formed to make the people liable to further compulsion, he was alarmed for the consequence. He would put it to the House, whether any people could be placed in a situation more oppressive and degrading than by this Bill, which placed a man in a situation where he could be flogged. This execrable mode of punishment, according to the best authorities, was incompatible with good discipline, and in the French armies it was not known. It appeared by a recent publication, that several French soldiers, for an offence, were ordered, as a punishment, to attend on parade with sticks instead of swords. They were young men, and this punishment was resorted to in order that they might be induced to wipe off their disgrace. If they had been old men they would have been dismissed the service. He was sorry that he was compelled to make degrading comparisons with a foreign military government, but he was forced into such observations by the provisions of the Bill. By the influence of this Bill, the poor countrymen might be compelled to enter into the army, or the volunteers; but his great objection to it was, that it would be inefficient and unconstitutional. To take men from the cottage and their families, to render them subject to flogging and punishment, was so disgusting in his idea, that he could not find terms to express his detestation. From the number of Officers, Clerks, &c. to be employed in the operation of the Bill, he had great hope that it would prove impracticable. One clause also appeared so ridiculous, that it was evident the Bill could not pass without some alteration. The clause which related to fines, enacted that persons should pay a fine not exceeding twenty shillings, or less than five pounds. With all the dreadful consequences to be apprehended from the measure, it was some consolation to the people of England to know that the draught was administered by those who had administered similar remedies in Ireland—it came from the same chalice. The Noble Lord called the severities exercised in Ireland an unhappy system of coërsion. The Noble Lord supposes that a delicate subject required a delicate name, and the present Bill was softly termed a system of recruiting; but it was his duty to warn the people of the danger they stood in, and to tell the Noble Lord to keep his delicate hand off the people of England.

The Secretary at War expressed a hope that the worthy Baronet would leave the people of England to judge for themselves. It was a fact acknowledged, that armies under military discipline had gained great honour and victory, and the military punishments inflicted in England were neither unjust nor impolitic. None would believe that the punishment of French soldiers, as described by the worthy Baronet, was confined to wearing a stick. The Emperor of France was too well known, and discipline was more severe in the French army than in any part of Europe.

The question was then called for, and the House divided on the question; that the Bill do pass, the numbers were—Ayes 104—Noes 26—Majority 78—The Bill accordingly passed.

The third reading of the Distillery Bill was fixed for Monday. The other orders of the day were then postponed, and the House adjourned.

STATE PAPER.

TREATY OF ALLIANCE AND SUBSIDY,

BETWEEN HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, AND HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF THE TWO SICILIES, SIGNED AT PALERMO, ON THE 30TH OF MARCH, 1808.

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and his Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, being equally animated by a sincere desire of strengthening more and more the ties of friendship and good understanding which so happily subsist between them, have judged that nothing could contribute more efficaciously to that salutary end, than the conclusion of a treaty of alliance and subsidy:—For this purpose their said Majesties have named their respective Plenipotentiaries, viz. his Britannic Majesty, the Right Hon. William Drummond, one of his Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, and his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of his said Sicilian Majesty;—and his Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, the Right Illustrious and Right Excellent Thomas de Somma, Marquis of Circello, his Gentleman of the Chamber, Field-Marshal of his Armies, Knight of his Royal Order of St. Januarius, his Councillor of State, Secretary of State for the Department of Foreign Affairs, and Superintendant General of the Posts; who, after having communicated their respective full powers, have agreed upon the following Articles:—

Article I. There shall be a continuance of the sincere and constant friendship between his Britannic Majesty and his Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, their heirs and successors, which has always subsisted up to the present time.

Art. II. The two High Contracting Parties shall afford to each other, during the present war with France, every succour and assistance, in proportion to their respective forces, and shall prevent, by common consent, every thing that can cause them trouble or detriment.

Art. III. His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies engages to grant to the troops of his Britannic Majesty, stationed in the fortresses of Sicily and to all British ships of war, an exemption from all duties belonging to him, upon every thing of which the British squadrons in the Mediterranean, and the troops of that nation may stand in need, and which the country can furnish, in provisions, food, and in military and naval stores.

Art. IV. His Sicilian Majesty, being desirous of giving an additional proof of the sentiments by which he is animated, also engages to exempt from all duties belonging to him upon such provisions as may be requisite for the British ships of war at Malta, as well as all military stores which are to be found in the country, on condition, however, that each vessel or vessels of war be furnished with a requisition from the Governor of the said island, which shall specify the articles, and the quantity required.

Art. V. His Sicilian Majesty further engages, in virtue of the present Treaty, never to allow the enemies of Great Britain to bring into any of his ports during the present war, any British ships taken by the enemies of Great Britain.

Art. VI. His Sicilian Majesty also engages to open the ports of the Two Sicilies, during the present war, to British squadrons, as well as to all merchant and other ships belonging to British subjects, without any restriction whatever, referring to the Third Article, with respect to exemption from duties.

Art. VII. His Britannic Majesty engages in return, to defend, during the present war, the fortresses of Messina and Augusta, and to maintain there for that purpose, at his charge and expence, a body of troops, which, in the present war, shall consist of ten thousand men, and to augment their number, if the case shall require it. The disposition of which troops in the said fortresses, shall be in such manner and proportion as the Commanding Officer (to whom every requisite facility shall be given,) shall judge expedient; and his Britannic Majesty stipulates, that the said General Officers shall have the power of exercising martial law in the above-mentioned garrisons, with respect to their British troops, in the same manner, and according to the same rules, as are observed in other English garrisons. Quarters for the said troops shall be provided in the above-mentioned fortresses by his Sicilian Majesty.

Art. VIII. His Britannic Majesty further engages to pay to his Sicilian Majesty, during the continuance of the present war, an annual subsidy of three hundred thousand pounds sterling, (to commence from the 10th of September, 1805, when the British and Russian troops landed in the Neapolitan territory,) payable at the rate of twenty-five thousand pounds sterling per month; which payment shall always be made one month in advance, computing from the date of the signature of the present Treaty.

His Sicilian Majesty purposing to employ the said subsidies for the use of his marine, and of his land forces, shall regulate the distribution of them in such proportions as these two services may require, for the defence of his states, and for operations against the common enemy, and an account shall be given every three months to the British Government, of the manner in which his Sicilian Majesty shall have employed the subsidies paid to him by Great Britain.

Art. IX. The two High Contracting Parties desiring to strengthen more and more the ties which unite the two nations, and to extend their mutual relations, will employ themselves, as soon as possible, in concluding a Treaty of Commerce, the articles of which shall be equally advantageous to the subjects of both states.

Art. X. His Sicilian Majesty engages not to conclude with France a peace separate from England; and his Britannic Majesty, on his part, also engages not to make a peace with France, without comprehending and saving it in the interests of his Sicilian Majesty.

Art. XI. The present Treaty of Alliance and of subsidy, shall be ratified by the two High Contracting Parties, and the ratification shall be exchanged in due form in London, within the space of four months, from the date of its signature, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof, we, the undersigned, furnished with full powers from our respective Sovereigns, have signed the present Treaty, and have thereunto affixed the seal of our arms.

Done at Palermo, this 30th Day of March, 1808.

PROVINCIALS.

Cambridge, June 4.—The crops of peas having for several years past been greatly injured in this county, and last year almost wholly destroyed, a Correspondent is induced to offer the following preservation from what the farmers term the Green Lice. Take a chaldron of fresh burnt lime, unload it in the field where it is to be used, make a floor and spread alternately a layer of lime and a layer of moist sand, or fine earth; when the lime is expended, round up the whole in a heap, and in about 10 hours it will be fit to turn over; and if the whole of the lime is found slacked, and in a fine powdered state, it is then proper for immediate use. The method of dressing the crop is done by two men, a boy, a cart, and horse; when the cart is loaded, it is slowly moved in the furrows, (always against the wind,) whilst the two men, with corn shovels, cast the lime right and left, much in the same manner as they cast corn, observing to take a small quantity at a time; this operation should only be performed early in the morning upon a heavy dew, or after a gentle shower of rain, taking care to powder or dust all the plants slightly over; when it will be found that the caustic quality of the lime will have destroyed the insects, without the slightest injury to the crop; on the contrary it will much improve it. A chaldron of lime would cover several acres. The same application is equally destructive to the slug and small white snail, on the young clovers, &c. in the spring.

Manchester, June 9.—The utmost tranquillity prevails in the town, and has done so ever since the 26th ult. The races, it was apprehended, would produce some disturbances; but, I am happy to say, nothing of the kind has occurred during the first two days.—The assemblage of people upon Kersal Moor this day was immense, but the utmost harmony prevailed.—Upwards of thirty persons were taken into custody on Monday last, at a public-house in Ancoat's lane, some of whom are said to be the Delegates of the weavers; and nine others were that day brought hither in a manufacturer's caravan, guarded by dragoons, from Bury. Several of these persons have since been discharged; and I believe only 12 now remain in custody. In many parts of the country, particularly at Bury and Bolton, acts of extreme violence have been committed on respectable manufacturers, some of whom were threatened with death in the event of their refusal to sign papers for an advance of wages. Every little occurrence, however, is so much exaggerated by the busy tongue of rumour, that I am disinclined to state many things I hear, lest they should prove unfounded. The great body of the weavers, as I said before, are perfectly satisfied with the offers made them, and hundreds have in consequence resumed their employment. In the course of the last three days, three different regiments have arrived here, viz. the 5th Dragoon Guards, the 89th Foot (late Gen. Whitelocke's), and the 45th Foot.

Perhaps there is one of the greatest curiosities in a ye at Grasford, in North Wales, eight miles from the city o Chester, that ever was recorded in the annals of histo this church-yard they are 19 yew-trees; one of which h an evergreen in that baptised sacred ground upwards years (as handed down by ancient father to son of its ag circumference of which was taken by a curious travelle tive antiquity, on Wednesday, May 11, 1808, and la following dimensions:—one foot from the ground, its cir ence is seven yards eighteen inches; and five feet fr ground, it is the enormous size of nine yards nine inches of its arms are gone dead, and two more are following v pidly; yet there still remains a sound body and seve arms, that is supposed will pilot old age through anot century, before it pays its debt to nature, and drops i amongst the ancient dead it has so long shaded.

The steam of water is recommended as a cure for e state of irritation from defluxion of humours, for eyes b inflamed, or for those already in a state of disease and in tion, by holding the open eye over the steam for two minutes, five or six times. The vapour, it is said, will e eye, and supply the place of the natural secretions wh are defective, and dilute those which have become acr concentration.

A shocking circumstance occurred in the neighbour Wolverhampton, on Wednesday se'nnight. Mr. W Moseley, was married, on the preceding Sunday, to an young lady, of that place; and only a few hours after, nished the family with symptoms of insanity. In this s he on Wednesday destroyed several sheep, and obtain of loaded pistols, with which he alarmed the neighbou threatening to fire upon many persons. He next got p of a razor, and first cut his wife's throat, and then h almost every person who attempted to secure him was Neither he nor his wife is expected to recover.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

IMPORTANT INTELLIGENCE FROM SPAIN.

Two Spanish Noblemen, Viscount Materosa and Don Diego de la Vega, have arrived in London from Spain—they are deputed by the provisional governments of the provinces of Asturias and Gallicia to solicit the assistance of this country for a supply of arms, particularly ammunition and field artillery; and to point out the most effectual mode in which we can serve them, and distress the enemy. In Catalonia numbers of the French troops have fallen victims to the patriotic rage of the Spaniards. The French Officers who have been slain on the occasion are estimated at 400; and some accounts state, that the ports of Gijon, St. Andero, and Bilbao, have been opened to Great Britain. The following are further particulars:—

"The above Noblemen landed at Falmouth, from the Stag privateer, to which vessel they had made their way in an open boat from Gijon, a sea port in the province of Asturias, and offered the Captain five hundred guineas to convey them to England. The intelligence which they bring confirms all the intelligence which has hitherto been published respecting the disposition that prevails throughout almost the whole of Spain, to resist the treacherous invasion of the French. It appears that the whole of the province of Asturias had risen in open resistance, and 40,000 men had been embodied into an army. They had abundance of arms, but ammunition was rather scarce. The same spirit prevailed in Gallicia, where the population were rising en masse, and Commissioners had been sent there to organize a regular military force. So general was the detestation against the French in these provinces, that even the women were desirous of taking up arms in defence of their country. The inhabitants of St. Andero had manifested their determination not to submit to French usurpation, in the most decisive manner, and had actually issued a formal Declaration of War against the French. Mr. Hunter, the British Consul had been sent by General Murat from Madrid, as a prisoner to Saint Andero, with directions that he should be detained in close confinement there. As soon, however, as Mr. Hunter's arrival at St. Andero was known, the inhabitants rose instantly, liberated him, and to testify their sentiments in a still stronger manner, they committed the French Consul to prison in his stead. Viscount Materosa and Don Diego de la Vega were both in Madrid during the dreadful scene of slaughter which took place on the 2d of May, and they state, that in their opinion the number of French who were killed did not fall short of 4000 men, among whom were a very large proportion of officers, who were particularly singled out by the inhabitants as objects of vengeance. It was very generally supposed that the inhabitants of Catalonia and Biscay would follow the noble example which had been set them by those of the Asturias and Gallicia; indeed there appeared to be but one sentiment in the mind of the people of Spain with respect to the treacherous and atrocious conduct of the French. The Noblemen left Gijon on Monday, the 25th ult.

Our Readers will remember, that from the first moment when intelligence arrived of a change in the affairs of Spain, we treated as vague and unfounded the hopes of those, who from such alterations were induced to expect advantages to the cause of Great Britain, or of Europe at large. It now appears that our Ministers, roused by the application of the two Noblemen of whom we have spoken, are determined to send assistance to the unfortunate inhabitants of Spain. Already this question has excited a considerable ferment in this country—or rather the Editors of the Newspapers have made it an occasion of exciting a ferment. One party, the friends of the Ministers, extol the liberality and wisdom of Government; while the adherents of Opposition have in some of the Journals condemned Administration for tardiness. For our own part, we retain our original opinions, and feel no inclination to approve the conduct either of the one party, or of the other. We feel it our duty to enter our protest against the measures by which it is confidently reported, that our Ministers intend to give assistance to the populace of Spain. The history of all ages, and of all countries, affords a thousand proofs, how little can be done by a population, armed on the emergency of a moment, in opposition to veterans confirmed in courage and disciplined by experience. But it is not necessary to refer to distant proofs, and search the records of antiquity for the precedents of our conduct: precedents are in the recollection of us all: precedents abound in the narrative of the events that have followed the French Revolution: precedents live in our memories, and still act upon our feelings. The state of Europe, the overthrow of every continental coalition, the destruction of all the vain hopes held out by former Ministers, the slaughter of our soldiers, the weight of our taxes, these are precedents striking in their example, and tremendous in their pressure! We shall send to Spain, it is said, five or ten thousand men. And in the name of prudence, what good is to be effected by five or ten thousand men? Will they not be cut off like grass? Will they be able to oppose one moment's resistance to the unnumbered legions that BONAPARTE can sweep upon them? There is no intermediate hostile country through which the French troops must pass into Spain: the line of communication is easy and direct, and myriads of men can be wheeled to any quarter at a word. We send our little army to certain slaughter. But suppose that Ministers should even determine to send a really large and operative force into Spain, what must be the consequence? Why, that our own shores will be left completely defenceless: and BONAPARTE, finding all our strength employed on a foreign service, may gain an opportunity otherwise almost hopeless, of invading these Islands, and, we fear, of invading them but too successfully.—His superiority of numbers is of little avail against us while our regular troops remain at home, because the regular force, if it be but backed by a properly disciplined population, is sufficient to operate against an invading army, which must necessarily be disabled from bringing any vast numbers to bear at one time upon this country; but when our regular troops are removed, BONAPARTE will be able to oppose them abroad by an equal or a greater power than they possess, and to send another army of no less magnitude, against these Islands, which will then have become completely defenceless.—Under these circumstances, any accident of weather that should drive our navy from its stations, must lay us totally open to the military vigour of our invaders.

The more then we contemplate the state of affairs in Spain, the less ground can we perceive for any rational expectation of advantage. Small armies must perish. Great armies, in Spain, surrounded by inhabitants of different parties, and opposed by an enemy of infinite skill and bravery, must contend with no very bright prospect of success: and in the mean time England is left open. Let us not be told about generosity. Self-defence is a virtue far paramount to generosity. Let the Government spare the English people, rather than hurry [illegible] Spaniards. These are not times when Great Britain [illegible] take up her lance and gallop about, [illegible]

Quixotism, defending every weak or foolish nation, that having in prosperity lost all claims to British alliance, thinks fit, in adversity, to throw herself upon British mercy. To oppress the unfortunate, we trust will never be the disgrace of Englishmen; but to botch the holes that folly has made in her own coverings, is an employment dictated neither by necessity nor by honour.

The advices that have arrived this week from Sweden, are not of a very important description; but as far as they go, their intelligence is favourable. The armies in Norway and Finland appear to have exerted themselves with success against the Danes and Russians; and great loyalty and courage have been displayed, not only by the armies, but even by the peasantry.

A Cabinet Council sat yesterday afternoon, in Downing-street, and the deliberations lasted several hours. The Foreign Ambassadors were present, and Messengers were dispatched to the sea ports.

His Majesty took a ride yesterday on the Maidenhead Road, with three of the Princesses; after which the Royal Party joined the Queen and the other Princesses, at Old Windsor.

The embarkation of troops at Dover still continues. A part of the 95th regiment, from Hythe, has embarked. The amount and destination of the force that is to sail from Dover is not yet ascertained. Some combining it in point of time with the arrival of Colonel Murray with dispatches from General Moore, conclude that it is intended to reinforce our troops in Sweden. Others conceive that it is part of a force of 4000 men, that is to join the 6000 now assembled at Cork, to the command of which Sir Arthur Wellesley is appointed.—This latter is the more probable case.

It has been asserted, that the Spanish Noblemen, Viscount Materosa and Don Diego de la Vaga, have already entered into an agreement with Government, by which all the Spanish prisoners in this country are immediately to be released and sent back to Spain. Ammunition in great quantities is also preparing to be sent off for the use of the Spanish Patriots.

The King of Spain, his Wife, and Minister, have reached Fontainbleau, where the diversion of hunting has been prepared for the deposed Sovereign. The Prince of Asturias and Don Carlos have likewise arrived at Valency, their place of destination; while he who has thus disposed of them is engaged in the subjugation of their country. With what contempt must this wretched family, if they have the feelings of men, view themselves! An account is given in the papers of the march of the Portuguese troops to Bayonne; but no mention is made of the dispersion of any part of them in their route through Castille. The other articles are not very interesting, Several letters have been received from Stockholm, which contain intelligence of a very interesting nature. On the 23d ult. a number of British subjects arrived there from Russia; some of them had left Russia as late as the 10th ult. The effects of the war were very severely felt in Petersburgh and other parts of the Russian Empire. Government paper had fallen to a discount of 60 per cent. and the price of hemp and tallow had fallen above 75 per cent. All classes of people appeared to be dissatisfied with the war with Great Britain and Sweden. The French influence over the Russian Councils still continued unbounded, and General Caulincourt, in the name of an Ambassador, exercised, in fact, the functions of Prime Minister. The accounts which these letters contain of the operations in Finland, though not official, seem to be entitled to credit. They state, that the Swedes have been almost uniformly successful against the Russians, who have suffered dreadfully from the want of provisions. Great numbers of them perished in the snow, and the survivors were reduced to the necessity of feeding upon dogs, cats, and even roasted hides.

Accounts from Memel, of so late a date as the 17th ult. have been received. By these we learn the important fact of Silesia being in a state of insurrection against the French, and that immense bodies of troops were in consequence marching towards that country. French troops were also proceeding towards the Vistula, from a supposed apprehension, that the recent events in Spain had produced a change of sentiments in the Russian Councils.

FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

Extracted from that unrivalled and splendid Publication Le Beau Monde; or, Literary and Fashionable Magazine.

LADIES' DRESSES.

Kensington Garden Dresses.—A rich India muslin dress, with a superb embossed border, worked in floss silk, white or coloured, made short, walking length; high in the neck, and drawn full round the throat with a turban collar falling over; the sleeves are long and full, and confined tight round the wrist; whilst the back of the dress is loose and drawn into the shape. The Arabian Tunic worn with this dress is composed of India shawl-work of a bright primrose, elegantly relieved with a turban trimming wreathed with green sarsnet. The Arabian hat is a graceful melange of the turban and gipsey forms, of a delicate straw or chip, confined under the chin, with a bow and tassels of green sarsnet. Gloves straw colour, and half boots of green jane.

A short train dress of white net, bound with white satin round the bottom: the back of the dress is made square and low as also the front to match, with a deep rich lace falling over; a French body of pink satin, confined close under the bosom; the sleeves are short and full, and bound with white satin to correspond with the bottom; the Catalani tippet of white lace drapery, finished at one end with a rich white lace tassely is thrown negligently across the shoulder, whilst the other end hangs down plain, and without ornament. The Flora bonnet is made of white chip, trimmed with pink sarsnet and ornamented in front with a bunch of various coloured flowers. Necklaces of emeralds, or imitations of the same, are much worn with this dress; the gloves and shoes are of white kid.

GENTLEMEN'S DRESSES.

Morning Walking Dress.—A dark blue double-breasted coat, with large gilt basket buttons; white India dimity waistcoat and trowsers, and white silk stockings with a narrow clock; shoes with strings.

The most fashionable coats for Evening still remain dark blues, with full size gilt buttons, and black velvet collars, or forest greens, with buttons covered with cloth, and collars of the same; white waistcoats, and clear light drab kerseymere breeches, with silk strings at the knee. Light coloured mixtures or drab coats are again resuming their station for Morning Dress—these are made single-breasted, and, after buttoning on the breast, slope regularly away to the skirts—they are also something shorter in the skirt than the evening coat, have flat plated buttons, and collars of the same; quilting Marseilles waistcoats, single breasted, in a variety of small stripes on a white ground; white corduroy breeches, made rather long, with pearl buttons at the knees; and boots with brown tops.—White India dimity trowsers; also Nankin trowsers and gaiters. Some few striped trowsers we have seen worn, but they are considered as only adapted for dirty weather, or for wearing at the watering places.

ETON MONTEM.

On Tuesday was the Triennial Meeting, or Montem, of the young Gentlemen of Eton School, previous to a number of them being elected to College. Upon this occasion, as usual, they laid the travellers and others in the neighbourhood under contribution, to make a purse for the Captain of the School.

Their performance at this School was honoured with the presence of the Royal Family.

Her Majesty, the Prince of Wales, Princesses Elizabeth and Mary, went in a barouche and four.

The Salt Bearers were very elegantly attired in fancy dresses.

The young gentlemen were most of them dressed in military uniforms. The Royal Family alighted from their carriages and went into the College, where they remained upwards of an hour. At one o'clock they returned to their carriages, and, immediately after the procession commenced through the playfields to Salt-hill. Her Majesty's carriage led the way. When the Scholars arrived at the Mount on Salt-hill, an elegant flag was waved by the Ensign as a signal, and immediately after an oration was delivered by the Senior boy. They then retired to the Windmill Inn at Salt-hill, where a sumptuous dinner was provided for them. At five o'clock they returned to the College.

AMERICAN CONSULATE LONDON,

JUNE 6, 1808.

The following official communication to this Office, this instant received, I have deemed an incumbent duty to make public, for the information of all American Merchants and others affected thereby.

(Signed) Wm. Lyman.

St. Petersburgh, (14) 26, 1808.

SIR—I herewith hand you a copy of a Note I have lately received from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, which will acquaint you, that measures similar to those pursued by France, with respect to Neutral vessels trading between England and her Ports, have been adopted here. All intercourse by means of our flag is thus stopped between Great Britain and Russia. You will please to communicate this intelligence to all those whom it may interest, and believe me respectfully,

Sir, your most obedient Servant,

(Signed) Levett Harris.

Wm. Lyman, Esq. American Consul, London.

"In order to prevent the possibility of any communication whatever between Russia and England, his Imperial Majesty has judged it advisable to order that no vessel coming from an English port, even if it belongs to a nation friendly to Russia, and shall not be laden with any merchandize, shall be admitted into the ports of Russia. Every vessel, however, which shall not have been in England, may freely enter the Russian ports, and export the productions of the Empire, with this proviso, that the commercial houses to which such vessels shall be addressed, shall undertake in writing, that such vessels shall not go to England, but that they will consign their cargoes to some port belonging to a power friendly to Russia. The undersigned thinks it is duty to communicate this new arrangement to Mr. Levett Harris, Consul General for the United States of America, and seizes this opportunity to renew the assurances of his high consideration.

(Signed) Count Nicholas de Romanzoff."

Petersburgh, 10th April, 1808.

Mr. Levett Harris.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Monday the dispatches by the Lord Eldon, Earl Spencer, Travers, Monarch, and Camarthen, were finally closed at the East India House, and delivered to their respective Pursers.

INOCULATION.

By the Bill to prevent the spreading of the Small Pox, it is to be enacted,

1. That no one shall Inoculate for the Small Pox within the distance of three miles of any City, Town, or Village, under a penalty of 50*l.*

2. That in every place destined for Inoculation by the Suttonian method, the words "Small Pox Hospital," or "Pest House," shall be posted up in large and legible characters.

3. That if any person shall be taken ill of the Infectious Small Pox, they shall be removed to a distance from all other habitations, at the expence of the Parish, if their own relations are not able: and all Masters of houses where the infection may appear, shall write up on the outside of their houses in large and legible characters "Small Pox here," under a penalty of 20*l.*

4. And every Master or Mistress of a house where the Small Pox breaks out, shall within 24 hours send notice thereof to the Churchwardens and Overseers under a penalty of 10*l.*

No such penalty to be levied till after two months, and in case the infection has not spread, then the Magistrates to be empowered to remit the penalty.

We are happy to announce Mr. R. J. Thornton's National Botanical Works, just published—The new Illustration of the Sexual System of Carolus Von Linnæus, with Botanical coloured Plates of Select Plants, price 30*l.* and Vol. I. of The Philosophy of Botany, which also contains many plates, price 15*l.* Published by R. J. Thornton, M. D. No. 1, Hind-street, Manchester-square; R. D. Symonds, Paternoster-row, and J. White, Fleet-street. These works are peculiarly important, and will, no doubt, be sought after with avidity.

THE THEATRE.

COVENT-GARDEN.

THE WONDER. MR. COOKE'S DON FELIX—MR. FAWCETT'S LISSARDO—AN ODE ON SHAKSPEARE—MRS. MATTOCKS'S FAREWELL ADDRESS ON RETIRING FOR EVER FROM THE STAGE—GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE MERITS OF THIS ACTRESS.

On Tuesday evening the comedy of the Wonder was performed for the benefit of Mrs. Mattocks; and the part of Don Felix was acted by Mr. Cooke. The character of Don Felix is a character of very lively comedy: but we never before Tuesday night considered it as a character of burlesque. As novelty is so much the fashion of the present day, and people love to see rather that which is uncommon, than that which is good, perhaps Mr. Cooke was quite right in attempting something uncommon in this performance. It is said that the distinguishing and proud prerogative of genius is creation: that is, in acting, the production of some striking effect not exactly set down by the author. If this be the case, Mr. Cooke's Don Felix was certainly a performance of extraordinary genius. And Mr. Cooke did not content himself, like the mere pretenders to genius whom our foolish fathers have admired, with creating very surprising effects in certain individual passages or even scenes: but with a novel and magnificent boldness, turned the whole current of the character from the channel in which we have been accustomed to suppose that it ought to flow into a direction perfectly unknown before the present day. Of Miss Smith's Violante we are disposed to think most favourably. Mr. Fawcett in Lissardo is rather too gross. He has not that light foppery, nor that die away conceit, one or the other of which seems to be absolutely necessary for imparting comic effect to such characters as these. Mr. Lewis would play it admirably in the light style, and a more languishing affectation would be perfectly represented by Mr. Liston. Mr. Brunton's Colonel Briton has few faults, except that fidgetty littleness, that insignificantly-looking jerk of the shoulder, by which so many otherwise praiseworthy performances of this actor are perpetually marred. Mrs. Mattocks played the lively chambermaid: and her excellent performance served only to make us the more sensibly feel the loss that we were about to sustain in her retreat from the stage.

Between the play and farce was recited and sung an entertainment (if the name of entertainment may be given to a thing not at all entertaining) entitled an Ode on Shakspeare. This was little else than a selection of one or two detached verses from some of the most favourite compositions in honour of Shakspeare, such as Garrick's Flow on Silver Avon, and The Mulberry Tree. Mr. Cooke read two or three lines, and the singers repeated those lines to music: as a clerk gives out the first words of a psalm and the boys of the choir chaunt them.

Mrs. Mattocks then came forward, conducted by Mr. Cooke, and delivered a farewell address. She spoke it in plain prose, and we highly approve her judgment: for a lady or gentleman, who appears upon a stage to take leave of an audience, appears there, no longer as a performer, but as a private individual, bidding adieu to a great number of other individuals. Whether an actor really feel distress at the parting, or not, he generally wishes to have it thought that he feels: and he therefore does wisely in selecting such language as may give the strongest appearance of reality to his expressions of feeling. Certainly verse is not that language. Nobody ever yet made rhymes as he gave the parting pressure to the hand of one he loved.

In these few words of prose, she thanked the audience for the kindness which, for a period of fifty-eight years, they had invariably shewn to her: and said, that though many would be found with better claims to the public favour (loud cries of "No, never, never"), yet that no one would be found with a more heartfelt sense of that favour. She retired amidst the loudest applauses, still supported by Mr. Cooke, who behaved to her with the kindest attention.

Mrs. Mattocks, like most other really excellent performers, possessed a talent rather transcendent in one department, than tolerable in many. Among the best of her performances were the Widow Warren, in the Road to Ruin, and this character in the Wonder. She was more remarkable, perhaps, for the irresistibly comical breadth of her efforts, than for the delicacy of fine character: and accordingly it was rather in the broader parts of comedy, than in comedy, legitimately so called, that Mrs. Mattocks evinced her principal ability.

This season has deprived us of three favourite actresses, one of whom, Miss Pope and Mrs. Mattocks, both have [illegible] half a century performing nearly the same casts of character. We hope that the rage of retirement will not spread itself any farther among the veterans of the stage: it is with great uneasiness that we look forward to the departure of Mr. Lewis.

FINE ARTS.

EXHIBITION AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

No. 9. Village School-Mistress.—B. BURNELL.

This is a picture conceived like the works of Mr. Wilkie, on an humble subject, but certainly conceived in a loftier style. The arrangement and expression of the various figures which constitute the infantine groupes of this picture, deserve a considerable praise; but this artist appears to be exceedingly deficient in the mechanism of his profession. He has taken no pains to imitate the external appearances of nature: he seems to have attended only to the expression of feelings. If we are asked whether we prefer this picture, with all its strength of imagination, and all its weakness of execution, to the picture of Mr. Wilkie, which is often set up as the standard by which this work of Mr. Burnell must be judged, we shall have no hesitation in declaring, however bold the assertion may appear, that we would always rather see a weak execution accompanying a strong imagination, than a strong execution employed to hide a weak imagination. We have been attacked for asserting that the ability of Mr. Wilkie is not to be termed strictly genius. We adhere to that assertion. He has some talent in expression, but it is usually a very humble expression; his principal cleverness seems to lie in his execution. But is execution, even of the most perfect kind, to be denominated genius? Is expression of feelings so humble as those described by Mr. Wilkie, a kind of expression that deserves a title which is given to the most sublime efforts of the human mind? Execution in painting is just what versification is in poetry; a valuable aid to the works of genius, but not genius in itself. Mr. Wilkie's style of expression in painting is what an epigram is in poetry: a quaint, sharp, hitting idea, which deserves the name of talent, cleverness, acute observation, but not genius. Styles of poetry and painting, which are much above this kind of production, for instance, the style of Horace's satires, and the style of Hogarth's pictures, may be humour, may be wit, but even these are not genius. If any body will prove to us that Mr. Wilkie's style is a style that operates upon the feelings, or enlarges the understandings of those who view his pictures, we will gladly acknowledge our error, and allow him the praise of great genius, as readily as we now allow him the praise of great cleverness.

67. Cardinal Beaufort terrified by the supposed Apparition of Gloucester. H. FUSELI, R. A.

"He hath no eyes: the dust has blinded them.
"Comb down his hair; look! look! it stands upright."
Second Part of King Henry VI. Act 3, Scene 3.

Mr. Fuseli, in his ardour for obtaining the reputation of genius has rushed upon an extreme, exactly the opposite of that which we have mentioned in Mr. Wilkie, and treated the town with bombast. This is a —— "Vaulting ambition, which o'erleaps itself

"And falls o'the other—

Mr. Fuseli seems to have a black and blue imagination, that tinges every object which enters it. He looks through a darkened glass, and of course sees every colour deeper than it appears to ordinary eyes. But this eccentricity is not admirable: it is merely strange. In viewing this picture a thousand faults rush upon the mind. We will pass over the unnatural outlines of the figures in general, and mention but one defect: which is the right eye of Cardinal Beaufort. "He has no eyes," says the Cardinal, speaking of the supposed apparition: and really one would think, from looking at Mr. Fuseli's picture, that the Cardinal meant to supply that deficiency in the ghost, by the loan of one of his own visual orbs: for his Reverence's right eye which by the bye is nothing but a round ball of dirty white, like the eye in a boiled cod, is actually come from the inside of the head, and seems rather to hang on the eyelid than to glare from the socket. Mr. Fuseli never spoke more truly than when he said: "If you want things as they were, go to Northcote: "if you want things as they are, go to Opie: if you want "things as they never were and never will be, come to me."

49. Trap-ball: Portrait of a Young Gentleman. H. THOMSON, R. A.

This picture is placed in an unfavourable situation of the room: but its merits will bring it very forward upon the minds of critical observers. For natural attitude and lively expression, this picture surpasses any thing of the same kind, that we for a long time have seen: the eagerness of the countenance is catching, and we feel ourselves animated while we gaze.

20. Maternal Affection. A. J. OLIVER, A.

"Who sate and watched my infant head,
"When sleeping on my cradled bed?
"My mother!"

This picture is not without faults: but where the general feeling is true to nature and to taste, little deviations should not be minutely scanned, particularly in a young artist. The attitude and expression have great tenderness: and the softness and modesty of the colouring are well adapted to the temper of the subject.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, WESTMINSTER,
SATURDAY, JUNE 11.

TRIAL OF GOVERNOR PICTON FOR TORTURE.

This was an indictment against the Defendant, charging him with applying the torture to Louisa Cauldrone, a girl 12 years old, in the Island of Trinidad. The Defendant had been convicted of the offence, with which he stood charged, but a successful application for a new trial had been granted, on the grounds that the Defendant, as Governor of the Island of Trinidad, was justified in inflicting the torture by the laws of Spain.

Mr. Garrow, for the Prosecution, opened the case eloquently. It was not his intention to take up the time of the Court by a detail of the facts, which the Jury would have better from Louisa Cauldrone; but the case the Learned Counsel described as being one which deeply interested the public, inasmuch as it involved the character of the British name, by charging a British Governor with cruelties which Englishmen would shudder at. The Learned Counsel commented at considerable length on the alleged conduct of the Governor, and at the conclusion of his speech he observed that he should reply to any defence that might be set up in order to justify the conduct of the Defendant.

Louisa Cauldrone was examined. She stated that she lived servant to Pedro Louis, in the Island of Trinidad, in the year 1801. A robbery had been committed in the house of her master, and witness was taken into custody on suspicion, as was also a man whom she knew of the name of Carlos Gonsalez, and they were taken before Governor Picton, who said that if witness did not confess who committed the robbery, he would deliver her over to the hangman. Witness was guarded to prison, and after 11 days confinement she was taken before Mr. Begerat, to whom she denied any knowledge of the robbery. In the evening the witness was taken to the picket, and put upon it, the right hand being fixed to a pulley on the ceiling, and the left leg on the picket, whilst the other arm and leg were bound together behind her, and in that situation witness fainted, and she could not say how long she had undergone the torture. Begerat was present at the torture, and on being questioned by him, witness confessed that Gonsalez had committed the robbery; and this confession was made whilst under torture. After having been taken down, witness was put in heavy irons, and sent again to prison, and the following day was put on the picket, in which situation she remained twenty minutes. She was again questioned as to the robbery, and she made the same confession to Begerat that Gonsalez was the thief. Witness was afterwards confined eight months in irons, and she was so much injured that she could not stand upwright. Her wrists and under her arms were parts so much injured that she had not yet recovered; and at the time of the infliction of the torture, she was not more than 14 years of age, and had lived two years in the service of Pedro Louis. Witness stated that she had not a person to defend her, nor was any one permitted to have access to her. She had been picketted without food, and the pain was very bad. Witness was at length discharged by the order of Governor Picton.

Mr. Garrow was about to call other witnesses, when Mr. Dallas admitted the torture. The Learned Counsel justified the conduct of Governor Picton upon various grounds, the most material of which was, that the laws of Spain authorised torture, and consequently the conduct of the Governor was justifiable, for he was bound by the terms of the capitulation to enforce the existing laws of the place. The Defendant had acted by the advice of one of the Judges of Trinidad, and the girl's offence was of a nature, which in this country would have subjected her to an ignominious death.

The Learned Counsel proceeded to justify the Defendant's conduct at great length, and with considerable ingenuity, after which a number of witnesses were called to prove the customs and the manner of punishments of the Island of Trinidad. A multiplicity of Spanish law-books, translations, and other documents, were also produced, to justify the Defendant's conduct, and to prove that he had merely done his duty in the case of Louisa Cauldroue.

Mr. Garrow, in a very argumentative reply, contended that no evidence had been adduced in defence to justify the conduct of the Defendant. The laws of Old Spain were no excuse for torture in the Island of Trinidad, providing that defence should be made out to the Jury. They did not authorize a British Governor to descend to acts of cruelties by torturing a female of such tender years; but he would contend that Trinidad was in possession of England, and subject only to British jurisprudence.

Lord Ellenborough briefly summoned up the evidence, and the Jury, after retiring for a considerable length of time, returned a verdict of Guilty, subject to the opinion of the Court on points of law.

The trial lasted ten hours, and the Court was excessively crowded.

OLD BAILEY.

MONDAY, JUNE 6.

Joseph Moody, a Serjeant in the Guards was capitally indicted for stealing 326*l.* in money and Bank notes, from the person of James Bowden. It will be remembered that the prisoner was observed at a public-house in Covent-garden, exposing a large quantity of Bank notes and money, and suspicion being raised, he was taken before a Magistrate, where he said a man had met him in the street, and given him the money to hold, but had never again demanded it of him. At last the prosecutor came forward, who stated that he fell into bad company, had been made drunk, and stript of his money.

Mr. Garney, in opening the case to the Jury, said the prosecutor admitted that he had not been made drunk by the prisoner, but that he fell into his company after he became intoxicated. He gradually became worse and worse, and was at last so much overcome, that he had no distinct recollection of any thing that had happened.

The Recorder interrupted the Learned Counsel, and said, if he was not prepared to contradict the prisoner's statement, namely, that he had given him the money, it was useless to proceed. It was also observable that the prisoner had not made the prosecutor drunk, and for any thing that could be shewn, he might have given him the money in the moments of intoxication. The prisoner had confessed himself in the company of the prosecutor, and that the money was given him. If his confession was at all made use of, it must be taken altogether, and therefore the jury must acquit the prisoner.

The Jury pronounced a verdict of Not Guilty, and the officer returned the money to the prosecutor, which he found upon the prisoner when he was apprehended.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7.

SHOP LIFTING.—Charles Brown and John Brown, respectable looking young men, and brothers, were capitally indicted for stealing, in the shop of Mr. Taylor, Jeweller, in Leadenhall-street, two diamond rings, value 10*l.* and upwards. It appeared in evidence, that on the 20th of May last the prisoners, dressed in mourning, with crape round their hats, went into Mr. Taylor's shop, and asked to look at some rings. They were shewn some, when they said they wanted some mourning rings made, with mottos, and pulled from their pockets some locks of hair and some brass rings.—While they were looking at the fancy rings placed before them, John Brown wiped his face with his handkerchief, then put up his glove, and pretended to have put the finger in his eye, and to be in great agony. He asked for a glass of spring water to allay the inflammation, which was given him; still he pretended to be in great pain, and stamped about the shop. The brother, Charles Brown, advised him to get into the chaise, inferring that they had a carriage waiting at the door. He seemed to acquiese, and left the shop. The other gave an order for two mourning rings, at three guineas each, and one at a guinea and a half, then followed his brother. Their conduct had previously raised the suspicion of the prosecutor, and looking carefully over the rings he had shewn the prisoners, he missed two of the rings and a Diamond pin. He instantly went after the prisoners, and observing no carriage standing in the street, he directed his way towards Cornhill, and saw the prisoners in another jeweller's shop, looking over an assortment of rings. He went in, and knowing the master of the shop, he said to the person serving behind the counter, you know me, and immediately put his foot against the shop door; then turning to Charles Brown, he said, "Sir, when "you have done I wish to speak with you." Brown made no reply, but instantly struck the prosecutor with a short whip he had in his hand, and endeavoured to make his escape. The prosecutor however held tight by him, and prevented him from getting away; the shopman at the same time secured John Brown. Near where they were standing, 13 diamond and fancy rings were found, which in the scuffle they had dispossessed themselves of; two of these were the property of the prosecutor, and the same he had missed. They were taken into custody, and upon their persons were found divers locks of hair folded up in white paper, and size rings wrapped up with the hair.

The prisoners were found Guilty—Death, and the Common Serjeant said there were no less than three more capital indictments against the prisoners for the same sort of felony, and that they appeared to have made it a regular business.

Same day sentence of death was passed on Thos. Wood, for coining; Isaac Regus, for house-breaking; Thos. Russell and J. Smith, for stealing goods in a dwelling-house; John Brown and Charles Brown, for like offence; Daniel Allen, for house-breaking; Tyman Harris, for stealing goods in a dwelling-house; Thomas Henrney, for a like offence; Mary Miller, for privately stealing; William Smith, for house-breaking; John Taylor, for feloniously cutting and stabbing Sarah Wood; Thomas King, for a highway robbery; John Welford, for stealing goods in a dwelling-house; Sarah Burgess, alias Jones, Hannah Gogan, and Samuel Williams, for stealing goods.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 8.

Alexander Macdonald, a baker, was tried for a robbery on London Bridge. This was the case detailed some time since where the prisoner was accused of having committed the robbery long before, but the prosecutor had refrained from making his charge till he got a debt which he said the prisoner owed, though the money he stated himself to have been robbed of was four times the amount of the debt. The Jury did not believe the prosecutor's statement, and acquitted the prisoner.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9.

Seven prisoners were tried, four of whom were convicted of felony, and three acquitted, when the Sessions ended, and sentence of transportation for seven years was passed on the following prisoners:—Robert Pailey, Joseph Lebeck, James Tollson, William Lowe, Wetkin Roberts, Mary Evans, Richard Abrahams, Mary Jones, Ann Hodges, sen. Thomas Hutchins, Jane Day, Thomas Morgan, John Green, James Tolley, Frances Spencer, Mary Lewis, Sarah Edwards, John Kenson alias Brooks, Thomas Alldridge, John Wilson, James Clark, Thomas White, Sarah Kettle, and Ann Powell. One was ordered to be imprisoned for two years, six for one year, thirty for different periods, six to be publicly whipped and two privately fined 1*s.* each and discharged; and 59 discharged by proclamation.

BOXING.

The battle between Dockarty, of pugilistic note, and a Scots Baker, of the name of Peatiken, the former having been backed 40 guineas to 20 against his adversary, was decided yesterday, at Goulder's Green, on the Hendon-road, in the presence of a miscellaneous company of several hundreds, from the Duke, Marquis, and Lord, down to the Costermongers and Kids of the Metropolis. Dockarty is known to the public as a professional fighter, who was beaten by young Belcher a few weeks since on Epsom Downs. The Scots Baker, who has recently beaten a couple of novices, entered the lists with no very favourable omen, as the result of the contest verified—he had to contend with a good fighter, in speaking generally of Dockarty, because he possesses, in a certain degree, a little of every requisite, and added to this he was a tried bottom man. The combatants set to at one o'clock, and bettings were seven to four on Dockarty. It would not gratify even the amateur to detail the rounds of the battle, for although Dockarty evidently was not in fighting condition, his adversary never gave a turn to the betting.—Dockarty had something the best of the first round after the Baker had made play, and the second round also ended very materially in Dockarty's favour.—The combatants rallied in this round and exchanged hits, and whilst thus contending Dockarty took most of the fight out of his adversary, by a well-planted hit at length on the baker's head, which dropped him dexterously. Bets were offered three to one, and this odds was never lessened during the combat. Peatiken often hit his adversary, but his blows, even in vigour, were inoffensive. He appeared before Dockarty (who never fought so bad) a greater novice than even those novices he had beaten appeared before him, and in the latter rounds of the battle he shewed some currish manœuvres. The Baker had received a hideous black eye in the second round, and he had some body hits. He gave in after fighting three quarters of an hour, without taking any material harm, and if not entirely to the satisfaction of his friends, he displayed more judgment than he had done in any part of the combat. As the day was fixed on for elegant pastime so it finished with the baiting of the bull.

POLICE.

UNION-HALL.—SATURDAY, JUNE 11.

Thomas Coates was also brought up, and underwent a long examination, on suspicion of robbing an old woman, named Susanah Bagshaw, of two guineas, one seven-shilling piece, some silver, two knives, a cap, and a bunch of keys. She stated that she lived at Greenhithe, in Kent, and on Sunday last came to Clapham to see her son, and went to the Rising Sun public-house to inquire after him, when the prisoner, who was there, told that he knew where he then was, saying at Wandsworth, and would shew her the way, when, after having had some refreshment, she went with him across several fields, as she supposed to Wandsworth, but by the time they got there, it was so late, that every person seemingly was in bed, which prevented her getting lodgings; in consequence of which he took her to an old hay-rick, where through the fatigue of her journey she laid down and fell fast asleep, and when she awoke discovered that the Prisoner had left her, and her pocket containing the sums and articles above alluded to was cut off and gone.—To the aforesaid charge the Prisoner made no reply and was committed for another hearing.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

CORONER'S INQUEST.—Wednesday evening a Coroner's Inquest was held at the Cock and Castle, Kingsland, upon the body of Reuben Mayne, a boy of 10 years of age, supposed to have been murdered by his father. It appeared from the evidence taken, before Mr. Unwin, the Coroner, that Reuben Mayne, the father of the deceased, who worked as a brick-maker in the fields of Mr. Rhodes, in Kingsland, cohabited with a woman of the name of Anne Smith, who was not the mother of the deceased, and who was constantly endeavouring to exasperate the father against his son. On Thursday night, the 2d inst. at the White Hart public-house, in Hornsey, he was heard to express an intention of setting fire to the sand-houses, and afterwards he obtained a match from the landlady, it is supposed for that purpose. About one o'clock in the morning of the 3d, the people who slept in the brick-field were alarmed by the crackling, and it was discovered, that the outside hut of a row of six bovels was in flames; and that Reuben Mayne, the father, and Anne Smith, had made their escape from the adjoining sand house, which they occupied, but had left the child within. This fact was not disclosed to the bye standers until the hut, which was supposed to contain the deceased, was nearly consumed, when the father seemed to express some anxiety for the safety of his son. During the interval between the discovery of the fire, and the destruction of Mayne's hut, the cries of the child had not been heard. Upon searching the ruins, the body of the deceased was however found, with the feet and head nearly burnt from the body, and the entrails protruded through the abdomen. It was not till after three messages that the father of the child could be induced to come and examine the body; and when he arrived, he treated the affair with apparent indifference. One of the witnesses, who was a brick-maker, deposed, that he met Reuben Mayne and Anne Smith on their way from the fire, when the former told the latter, that if she "revulged" she was a dead woman. A medical Gentleman, of the name of Savage, attended, who had seen the body before burial, and who deposed, that to his recollection there were no external marks of violence, excepting what might be attributed to the fire; but, for the further satisfaction of the Jury, it was ordered, that the body should be taken up to be re-examined, that it might be ascertained, by a more minute inspection, whether any previous violence had been committed on the child. The examination of the several witnesses on this distressing occasion, occupied the Jury nearly two hours and a half; and, after the re-consideration of the matter with the assistance of the Coroner, for about a quarter of an hour, a verdict was found of Wilful Murder against Reuben Mayne; and Anne Smith was declared an accessary to the crime.

A paragraph appeared in a Morning Paper, on Tuesday, stating, that a soldier was in the custody of two Bow-street Officers, on a charge of being the robber and murderer of Mr. Joachim, in a field leading to Camden-Town, and that the suspicion was strengthened by one of his fingers being shot away. The fact is, no man has been in custody; but the case and circumstances have been most strictly investigated by the Magistrates, and the soldiers innocence has been satisfactorily established.

The Royal Family, and Ladies and Gentlemen of Distinction and Fashion, use the Original Russia Oil, for moistening the Hair when dressing; which is so great a nourisher to the Hair, as to prevent it turning grey to all periods of life; promotes the growth; prevents its falling off; and restores it on bald places, if the least roots remain. Several Gentlemen that were bald have declared, after using the Russia Oil regularly for three months, the bald places became nearly covered with hair.—Caution.—As noxious counterfeits are selling in petty shops, and, to deceive, have imitated the Russian Eagle on the shew bills and covers, purchasers will therefore be particular in observing, that each bottle of the Original Russian Oil has a label on the outside wrapper, signed in Russian gold ink, "Mochrikufsky and Prince;" any without that signature are counterfeits. Ladies and Gentlemen going to Watering-places ought not to neglect, after bathing, to use the Russian Oil, as it prevents the general case of the water occasioning the hair to fall off and become shaded. Also Gentlemen should not omit applying it to the whiskers to prevent them turning grey, which is too generally experienced on account of the constant wetting they receive from shaving: this case is clearly proved, as the whiskers mostly change colour sooner than the hair on the head. Promotes whiskers, eye-brows, &c. at 7s. per bottle, or a bottle containing four small, at One Guinea. Sold wholesale and retail by the Proprietor, A. Prince, No. 9, John-street, Oxford-street; and, by appointment, by Mr. Smith, perfumer to his Majesty, New Bond-street; Hendrie and Sons, perfumers to her Majesty, Tichborne-street, Golden-square; Bayley and Blow, perfumers to the Prince and Princess of Wales, and Duke and Duchess of York, 5, Cockspur-street; and most principal perfumers or Medicine Venders in England, Ireland, and Scotland.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER TWENTY-FIVE.

ON THE CATHOLIC PETITION, AND ITS RECEPTION.

(Concluded from our last.)

Having treated at large on the expediency of emancipating the Catholics, it remains for us only to say a few words upon the justice of that measure. At first sight it seems almost unnecessary to occupy a moment's time in establishing so obvious an axiom, as that the subjects of the British King are entitled to British rights: but so omnipotent are prejudice and interest, that they can overturn self-evident propositions, and justify injustice itself. The principles of right are eternal and immutable: shall they be combated by circumstance, which in its nature is perpetually varying, dying, reviving? Surely Providence did not send four millions of human beings into the world, to form the vast majority of a nation, and yet live the slaves of that nation's minority! Surely it cannot be the intention of nature, that freedom shall be understood as the enjoyment of the few at the expence of the many!

It will be said that any man, or body of men, shewing a disposition which is dangerous to the State, may, by every law of society, be restricted from the exercise of those privileges which are permitted to less obnoxious people. We allow that rule, but we do not allow that the Catholics have shown any such disposition at all. They certainly shew a disposition to right themselves: but they are not very likely to be hostile to the State, when the State has made hostility no longer tempting to them. No body fights, when he can get nothing by fighting—not even an Irishman. But whether the something that he may get by fighting, be called honour, or whether it be solid profit, fight he will, as long as that something continues to dazzle his fancy: nay, though we on this side of the Irish channel, may conceive that he is contending without a cause, yet as long as the motives, the irritatingly efficient motives, continue to operate, the real importance belonging to the final cause, to the object of the struggle, will be but very little regarded. And in this inconsistent, incomprehensible world, where half the objects of our wishes are valuable only in fancy, it is not unreasonable to allow the Irish to set some price on a matter which intrinsically may not be very estimable. But after all, whether the concessions required by the Catholics, be really valuable or nominally valuable, we have no right to enquire: we have promised the Irish certain favours, estimable or not, which we now refuse to grant, and which they still wish to acquire: is it not just that we concede them?

There is one answer, which seems to be the great and material obstacle to all accommodation on this subject: and that answer is "The King's coronation oath." Some people plead this oath openly, and are really weak enough to believe that the Emancipation of the Catholics will be a violation of this oath: others, considering that such idle prejudices are entertained by many people high in power, think it expedient to support the error, for fear of injuring themselves, whatever they may think of the real duties imposed by the oath. To the mass of the people of this country, who expect no rewards from courtiers on the one hand, and who can gain nothing by the Emancipation of the Catholics on the other, the grounds and obligations of this oath ought to be made intelligible: we will therefore state what we conceive to be the fair exposition of this troublesome case.

In the first place, the King's oath binds him "to main-"tain the Protestant Religion as by law established."—Now it seems very evident, that if the State, which supports the Protestant Religion, be brought into danger, the Protestant Religion, which is supported by the State, must incur a danger too. If on the other hand the State is strengthened, the Protestant Religion, as connected with that State by an establishment, is likely to derive strength also. We think that in the former Numbers of our Disquisition on this important subject, we pretty plainly proved that the perpetuation of the disabilities that oppress the Catholics, is only a perpetuation of civil warfare: and we believe from a statement of the proportion which the numbers of the Catholics bear to the numbers of the Protestants, that the operative force of the country would be considerably increased by the enlistment of Catholic troops in our service, an enlistment which, at present, by the irritation of the public mind in Ireland, can go on but very, very slowly. Having substantiated these facts, we seem to have proved that the State must become stronger by the Emancipation of the Catholics: and, the State becoming stronger, the Church, as connected with it, appears likely to become proportionally strong.

In the second place, it is a rule in the construction of every obligation, that the intention and spirit in which it was framed are to be considered as the guide. Now the King has two capacities, a legislative capacity, and an executive capacity: and the oaths that he takes are imposed upon him in order to prevent his executive power from encroaching on the legislature, not in order to tie up his hands in the legislative employment of his power. This oath is intended, as has been well observed, to bind him by religious sanctions to observe the law, but by no means to hinder him from consenting to such new laws as his Parliament may choose to propose to him.

In the third place, the oath is a promissory oath: an oath which the people have enjoined to their Sovereign. But he who exacts a promise, has certainly a right to dispense with the performance of that promise: and when the King and people shall conceive that the general good will be promoted by the release of that promise, surely no law, divine or human, forbids them to pronounce the promise released.

But if at last we must construe the obligation by the letter and not by the spirit, it will not be difficult to prove that even the letter of the oath contains no prohibition. The King swears "to govern according to the statutes in "Parliament agreed on, and to the laws and customs of "this realm:" and in another part of the oath, he binds himself "to maintain the Protestant reformed religion as "by law established." Now there are three ways in which these obligations may be interpreted. The laws established may mean the laws which at the time of King William's accession to the throne, when this oath was devised, had been already established: or may mean the laws which may be successively established by the legislature: or may mean the laws which shall have been established and be actually in existence at the moment when each successive King shall ascend the throne. If the meaning be, the laws which at the time when the oath was devised had already been established, then there is no impediment to the Emancipation of the Catholics: for when that oath was devised and taken by King William, the Catholics sate in both Houses of Parliament in Ireland, and were eligible to all offices, civil and military: it was not till several years had elapsed, that they were deprived of the rights which they are now seeking to regain. If the meaning be the laws which may be successively established by the legislature, the legislature is thus acknowledged to possess a right of establishing laws: and the King, as a part of that legislature, is entitled to take a share in the formation of laws, according to which laws he has sworn that he will govern, when they are formed. Such a law would be that Emancipation which the Catholics now request from the legislature. If the meaning be the laws which shall be in existence at the moment when each successive King shall ascend the throne, then William and Anne had no right to make those laws relating to the Catholics, which, by diminishing their privileges, induced them to rebellion: by inducing them to rebellion endangered the State: and by endangering the State contributed to injure the Protestant religion, as connected with the State. If King William and Queen Anne had no right to make laws thus dangerous to the Protestant church, then King George, in repealing those laws, does no new act, but only sets right those affairs which his predecessors had set wrong: or perhaps, to speak more correctly, he only pronounces void an act, which, being unlawful, was in fact, ab initio, void. But it seems too ridiculous to argue that the "laws established" really mean any thing else than "the laws that may be successively enacted by the "legislature." For if the King may not use his legislative authority in altering the laws relative to the Church, he may not use his authority in altering any other laws: since at the same time when he swore to maintain the Protestant Religion as established by law, he swore also to govern according to the statutes in Parliament agreed on. Here if the laws established exclude the notion of the laws to be established, the statutes already agreed on exclude the notion of statutes to be agreed on hereafter: and then the King has no legislative power: and then what is the British Constitution?

Besides, it should be recollected that the King has already made alterations in the laws relating to the Catholics. During the last thirty years the Catholic subjects of the King have been admitted to a great variety of privileges from which they were excluded when George the Third ascended the Throne: and who shall say that the King has a right by his Coronation Oath to alter some existing constitutions, and has no right to alter others? All that can be said appears to resolve itself into this: If the King, notwithstanding his Coronation Oath, did consent to the repeal of the penal statutes in 1778, or 1789, or 1793, he may consent, notwithstanding his Coronation Oath, to the repeal of the disqualifying statutes in 1808.

Ireland has a right to the Emancipation of the Catholics. When Mr. Pitt persuaded the Irish people, or rather the Irish Parliament, to adopt the measure of union, he offered by way of compensation for the sacrifices which Ireland must make of her independence, nay, of her very existence as a nation, the complete Emancipation of several millions of men from a state of exclusion the most painful and degrading. It was for the Emancipation of the Catholics that Ireland consented to be no longer a country—to blot herself from the map of the world. She agreed to sacrifice herself for the freedom of her children: she has undergone the sacrifice, but her children have not been freed! We have no doubt that Ireland, as well as England, will at some future period derive advantages from the measure of union: but we have also no doubt that her immediate sufferings have been great and heavy. An immediate price ought therefore to have been paid to her: the price which England stipulated to pay. The country of Ireland is now before our eyes, a painful and dangerous memorial of Ministerial ambition and British fallacy. Her noble families, once the sources of her wealth, as they were the supports of her grandeur, have emigrated to England, in the train of their delegated Parliament. They have been obliged to abandon the city of Dublin, the capital that was endeared to them by early habits, by associations which have grown with their growth, and strengthened with their strength, by the influence and respect which they commanded, by the benefits and opulence which they diffused, and by the grandeur of hereditary nobility. These sorrows may seem but imaginary—it matters not: call them imagination—prejudice, if you will: but while human happiness depends upon imagination, or even prejudice, a real evil is inflicted upon us in the deprivation of ideal good. And now the only vestiges remaining of that legislature, which once directed the Government of districts, and gave life and motion to the interests of millions, must be traced in—a hundred members! who are sent to the United Parliament in England, and who surviving their country's existence, sit, as Mr. Grattan has forcibly expressed himself, "the images of degradation, and the representatives "of nothing!"

The Irish Opposition have been compared to the sea in a storm. Unhappily, the orb of liberty, which dawned from their bosom, was fated to sink amid their waves: and it went down with a mighty sound, as the ancients have fabled, that in the western seas the sun is heard to extinguish his fires, and hiss to the bottom of the ocean! Long will that sound reverberate in the ears of Irishmen: long will the recollection of it continue to remind them that they once were free: and may its warnings at length induce this country to pay the stipulated price of all the sacrifices that have been made by her sister nation! In the mean time let not the defenders of their country be aspersed as the breeders of sedition, when they are only demanding justice. Let them persevere in their manly course, and even though they fail in their immediate object, they must receive the reward of immortality. If those heroes who have lived or died in the cause of their country, be ever remembered by grateful posterity, the names of Charlemont and Grattan, of Leinster and of Curran, must always be recorded with the loftiest enthusiasm, in the pages of historians who shall celebrate their greatness, and in the traditionary tales of a people whom they could not preserve!

REVIEW OF POLITICAL PAMPHLETEERS.

No. XXV.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK'S PAMPHLET ON THE NECESSITY OF A MORE EFFECTUAL SYSTEM OF NATIONAL DEFENCE, AND THE MEANS OF ESTABLISHING THE PERMANENT SECURITY OF THE KINGDOM.

Lord Selkirk, in this pamphlet, proposes to call into military life every young man between the ages of 18 and 25. Each individual, from the 18th to the 19th year of his age, shall be liable to three months service: but from the age of 19 upwards, only three weeks, at a fixed period of the year, will be required annually till the age of 25, after which no one will be subject to any demands of military service. Every youth may enrol his name in any district that he prefers, and the period of his three months service may be left to the determination of the magistracy of the district. The mere sacrifice of so short a time as this scheme requires, cannot occasion any serious detriment to any individual's plans of life: the lower orders will not be sed by a pecuniary burden, such as that of the present ballot: an adequate allowance of pay will be made by blic to defray all their expences. Young men who choose e at their own charge, may be enrolled in a separate corps, the name of cadets; and from among these, all the cap- nd subaltern officers of the local battalions may be select These officers, at the end of the seven years, will be at to retire, as if they were still privates. His lordship s a great number of details as to the best mode of train- drafting the men, and of performing other technical mat- no means inconsiderable; and he proves, that upon this 0,000 young men, between the ages of 18 and 25, will be tly ready to obey the calls of their country.

ust be confessed that there are some objections to this ut they are objections which must occur in every efficient of militia; and we must be content to put up with un- ble, and comparatively insignificant inconveniences, rather n the risk of mischiefs so dreadful as those which now n the shores of Great Britain.

principal evil to be dreaded in this, as in every other heme, is the permanent duty to which the local militia must ected. It is easy to see, that without putting the men permanent duty, their real utility must be very trifling: Sir Isaac Newton is said to have laid himself upon a and practised the motions of swimmers in striking with the and feet, before he ventured to trust himself upon the so it seems necessary that the troops, whom we raise as idiary force, should learn, by something in its nature resembling actual service, that degree of discipline, of al obedience, and of mechanical celerity, which is indis- le in the hour of absolute danger. But this permanent ay induce mischiefs of a nature deeply important to the , and of course to the happiness of the people; and is left us but a choice between the evils of irregularity e, and of subjugation from abroad.

noment a number of young men are let loose from their desks, ools, or their books, or whatever other occupation it may employs their serious hours, a certain degree of relaxa- ust generally take place in their minds. They are assembled er in large bodies, to lead a life absolutely idle in compari- h the regular course of their labours; they will usually be ed, as in holiday times, with as much money as they can by ans collect: they will be surrounded by all the temptations ity, dissipation, and intrigue: and their dispositions in a hile will become completely detached from the business ession in which they may have been engaged before. In an time the mischiefs of a military encampment will not e themselves to the interior of that encampment; not only litia will become riotous and debauched, (as must be almost lies of idle men, and as even the Regulars, with all their es of discipline, unfortunately are in a considerable de- but the vices of the soldiers will creep upon the neigh- ood, and idleness, seduction, and profligacy of every kind, e the necessary consequence of such a constitution. Shall told that, as the plan of permanent duty implies an exer- military law, that law may be so strictly enforced as to the possibility of riots? Even this argument is not verable: for if the military law shall be enforced with nost strictness, in matters not properly military but moral, ide a door must be opened to oppression of every kind. petty tyrant will not possess ample opportunities of ing his malice on people below him, when, by taking himself the duties of a militia officer, he may punish ically the slightest offences, (and who does not commit offences?) which the ardour of youthful passion, and mptation of the time, render not indictable, but pardonable. Here the blessings of the constitution are ded for a while; and for about eight months in his life, Englishman will have surrendered to tyrants at home, (not arily as in a regular enlistment, but by compulsion) those able privileges of liberty which this very system is intend- preserve against the tyrants of foreign realms.

on the other hand, how much greater must be the mischiefs successful invasion would produce! No money is to be ted from the French: they have too long been hungrily g for the destruction of this country, to be induced with us, which, in other conquered nations are generally ed. We cannot be surprised if the French soldiers, once nful, were to exonerate every barbarity of ancient con and stamp their bloody greatness by the outrages of un- d lust, rapine, and revenge. All the evils arising to morals system of permanent duty for a Militia, are not to be ed in the thousandth part so much as the moral ill that ecrue from the slavery of a successful invasion: for what e, what have always been, the morals of slaves?

Besides it will be observed, that some advantage may spring even from the disadvantages of this permanent duty. When a certain spirit of idleness has spread itself among the lower classes of people, which, as we have been arguing, will be the necessary consequence of permanent duty, the chance of enlistments for the regular army must needs become infinitely greater than at present. Gentlemen who are too idle to work, but too poor to do nothing, constitute the majority of our regular officers: and we believe it will not be very difficult to prove that the same union of poverty and idleness has hitherto been, and will continue to be, the most abundant source of recruiting for privates. Lord Selkirk has not urged this as an argument in favour of his plan, and as far as morals are concerned, it certainly is not satisfactory: but as we had shown that our morals must ultimately be more endangered by the neglect of this system, than by the pursuit of it, we have thought it fair to adduce, as a further, though inferior consideration, the advantages which, in a political, if not a moral light, will accrue from the less vicious course of the two.

Lord Selkirk seems to hope that the business of education may be carried on in these encampments—that studies may be suggested which are likely to interest the young recruits—nay, that a contribution may be levied of two or three shillings from each youth for the payment of able teachers in the different departments of knowledge. We cannot concur in these expectations. Young men are not too fond of application at any time; and when they are removed from the observation of their parents, their tutors, or their masters, we fear that the disposition of idleness will take a still more full and unbridled indulgence. Upon the whole, therefore, our approval of the system of permanent duty is grounded, not upon a disregard of its dangers, nor upon a hope of its positive advantages; but upon an opinion, that, without such a system, disadvantages vastly more important must rush upon the country, to the destruction at once of its moral and its political excellence.

We are not aware that it is requisite to keep up so large a body of men as 400,000, which is the quota that this plan is expected to furnish. We should wish rather to see the number very much contracted, and the necessary time of service extended no further than the age of twenty-one. Young men between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one, may generally be spared with little inconvenience: but persons who have past their minority, are generally too much engaged in the active business of life to afford their time quite so readily. And as every individual who has past the age of twenty-one will have seen three years duty, it is to be presumed that, in case of actual danger, he will not be much less fit for service than he would be if he were harrassed with attendances up to the age of twenty-five.

But this is an objection only to the detail. The general principle we conceive to be the best that has ever been submitted to the legislature and the country. Its peculiar advantages are, that as every individual, without exception, will have been instructed in the use of arms at the most active period of his life, every individual will be capable of doing some service to his country at any subsequent time when her danger shall require his assistance: that the oppressive system of the ballot, with all its consequent inequalities of taxation, will be completely destroyed: and that the body of men actually enrolled, will be a body, not containing indiscriminately people of different ages, of fixed habits, and therefore of tardy apprehension in military discipline, but of young men, probably ardent in the cause for which they are assembled, and pliant enough to learn, without difficulty to themselves, or trouble to their teachers.

On the reasonings which constitute the latter part of his Lordship's pamphlet, we shall take an opportunity of making some observations in a following number.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH AND GOTTENBURGH PAPERS.

GERMANY.

BANKS OF THE DANUBE, MAY 12.—Letters from Turkey say, that a firman of the Grand Seignior will speedily appear, forbidding the introduction of English merchandize into Turkey, on pain of death. The Greeks of the Turkish Islands, and of the Morea, have declared themselves against the English, since they have learnt that the Russian Government, which they look up to as their protector, has declared war against England.

BANKS OF THE MAINE, MAY 20.—A letter from Vienna says—"Our foreign relations are managed, as usual, with secrecy, and nothing, as is proper, reaches the public. But the tranquillity which prevails here generally, and more particularly with regard to military preparations, shews that the warlike reports propagated abroad, are premature and unfounded."

DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN, MAY 21.—Tornea, by which the Russians intend to penetrate into Sweden Proper, is situated in the North of Lapland, and is the last town of Europe towards the Arctic Pole, and in summer exhibits the singular spectacle of constant daylight. At our midnight the sun is seen in the northern hemisphere under the polar stars. It was at Tornea that Maupertius, Celsius, and other mathematicians, accomplished the arduous task of measuring the meridian, and there the depression of the earth at the Poles was first discovered. This region is one of the most dreary the face of nature presents. Scarce a shrub rises from the frozen soil. The eye perceives only arid sands, barren heaths, and snow-covered hills. The territory of the Stadtholdership of West Bothnia, to which Tornea belongs, consists of 1,900 Swedish square miles, on which, however, there are scarce 70,000 inhabitants.

PRUSSIA.

KONINGSBURGH, MAY 8.—The following Declaration lately appeared in our Gazette:—

"However scrupulous Prussia may have been in maintaining her engagements entered into with France and Russia, with respect to breaking off intercourse with England and Sweden, yet the attempt has been again renewed, to place the conduct of the Prussian Government in this respect in an equivocal light. Such an attempt has been made in No. 460, of the Hamburgh 'Change List of the present year, in an article dated Helsingoer (March 10), stating, that a Prussian ship, Capt. Gerrin, commander, belonging to Memel, had arrived there from the North Sea, which, besides coffee, and a great quantity of cotton, brought a variety of merchandize from Sweden, all which were afterwards forwarded. But while this account exposes its unfounded nature by saying, that the goods were landed in Denmark, a country where the same prohibition exists as in Prussia, and departed thence without being hindered, the Prussian Government caused an examination to be taken of the shippers, pilots, and sailors, who declared that the ship sailed from Memel with a lading of tin ore for Hull, on the 27th May, 1807, was obliged to put into Norway on account of damage, and was obliged to remain there till the end of the year for the necessary repairs; from thence she reached Hull on the 27th of January, 1808, from which place she again sailed on the 27th of Feb. in ballast, without taking in any goods. On her voyage back she again went into Norway, on the 5th instant, to learn whether the Cattegat was free from ice; from thence she reached the Sound on the 10th, cleared out for Helsingoer on the 11th, as laden with ballast, for Varel, sailed the same day into the Baltic, and was driven by contrary winds into Liebau."

AMERICA.

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, APRIL 20.

On the motion of Mr. White, "Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the President of the United States to have manned and equipped for service, with all convenient dispatch, the frigates and vessels of war of the United States, to be used as in his opinion, the circumstances of the country, and the conduct of foreign powers towards the United States, may require."

A committee was thereupon appointed to bring in a Bill conformably to this resolution.

The Bill entitled "An Act laying an Embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbours of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto; and for other purposes," was read the third time and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 16.

The Committee to whom was referred the Correspondence between Mr. Munroe and Mr. Canning, Mr. Madison and Mr. Rose; and also the Communications made to the Senate on 30th March, containing a Letter from Mr. Erskine to the Secretary of State; and a Letter from Mr. Champagny to Mr. Armstrong, this day gave in their report to the House of the Senate. At the conclusion of which the following resolutions were submitted.—

Resolved, That the Committee do bring in a Bill, authorising the President of the United States, in the event of such a Peace, or suspension of hostilities between the belligerent Powers of Europe, or of such changes in their measures affecting Neutral Commerce, as may render that of the United States sufficiently safe in his judgment, to suspend the Act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the Ports and Harbours of the United States, and the several Acts supplementary thereto under such exceptions and restrictions as the public interest circumstances of the case may require: Provided such suspension shall not extend beyond days after the commencement of the next Session of Congress.

Resolved, That the Committee do bring in a Bill, authorising the President of the United States to suspend the operation of the several Acts, prohibiting the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandises, if, in his judgment, the public good should require it: Provided, that such suspension shall not extend days after the commencement of the next Session of Congress.

Resolved, That the Committee be instructed to report a Bill prohibiting after the day of all commercial intercourse with such of the belligerent Nations whose edicts against the neutral commerce of the United States may render such prohibition necessary.

Resolved, That the Committee be further instructed, to report a Bill expatriating all Citizens of the United States, commanding ships or vessels of the United States, who shall be convicted of voluntarily accepting any license, or paying any tax, in conformity to the British Orders of Council of 11th November.

Resolved, That the Committee be further instructed to report a Bill, imposing on the navigation and commerce of foreign nations, restrictions corresponding with the restrictions imposed by them respectively on the commerce and navigation of the United States.

WEST INDIES.

BARBADOES, MAY 12.—Notwithstanding the numerous ships of war on this station, the enemy's vessels arrive at, and depart from, their ports quite unmolested. Two men of war have lately arrived at Cayenne, and sailed again, supposed on a cruize on the coast of Brazil. On their passage from France, they captured two vessels, one the Harriet Guiseman, and the other the Neptune, from Gibraltar to Jersey. Four brigs of war have arrived about a month since at Martinique, and have proceeded again homewards. The Goree sloop fell in with two of them, but was beat off; the Wolverene brig afterwards chased them, but they escaped. I believe they are now blockaded in the Saints. The Eleanor, bound to Antigua, laden with provisions for the navy, was captured lately, and carried into Martinique, and proved to the enemy a capital prize, as they are much in want of provisions at that island, as well as at Guadaloupe. Four brig privateers were laid up in consequence of the scarcity, but sailed soon after the Eleanor was carried in.

An unfortunate affair took place on the arrival of a cutter from Martinique, a few days since, between Lieutenant P. of the Belleisle, and the commanding officer of the cartel, which ended in Lieutenant Purvis wounding three of the French officers, one of them very severely. He was in consequence brought to a Court-martial, and after four days trial was yesterday dismissed the service. He is a nephew of Admiral Purvis, who had been only just made.

Captain Ayscough, of the Hawke brig, and Captain [illegible] of the Fawn, have lately died on this station. Captain Pat[illegible] is appointed to the former ship, and Captain De Cour[illegible] the Fawn.

The Halifax, which arrived on the 7th inst. with [illegible] from Cork, brought orders to Admiral Cochrane, to detach the line of battle ships on this station, which will prevent Ramillies proceeding with the next fleet to England.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, JUNE 13.

Lord Hawkesbury rose, and, pursuant to notice, moved that a Committee be appointed to enquire into and duly examine the contents entered into between Mr. Palmer and Government respecting the management of the General Post Office; also to enquire into the cause of that Gentleman's dismission from the office of Comptroller-General to his Majesty's General Post Office, which was agreed to nem. con.

SICILIAN SUBSIDY.

Lord HAWKESBURY moved the order of the day for taking into consideration his Majesty's Message respecting the Treaty of Subsidy and Alliance with the King of Sicily. He said it had been the intention of his Majesty's Government to have introduced further stipulations into this Treaty; but under the cir[illegible]

e Earl of Suffolk called the attention of their Lord- to the Danish vessels and cargoes detained and sold pre- to the commencement of hostilities. He was induced to e a motion on the subject, because those captures were con- d with the Droits of Admiralty, and it was generally be- d on the Continent that compensation must be hereafter e to Denmark for the vessels so captured. The Noble Lord concluded by moving for returns of the sales and produce of Danish ships, captured previous to the late declaration of war.

Lord Hawkesbury intimated that it was impossible to com- ply with the Noble Earl's motion, as many of the ships alluded to were not sold, and consequently no returns had been made.

The Earl of Suffolk withdrew his motion, and pledged himself to bring it forward again early in the next Session.—The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

LOCAL MILITIA.

Lord Hawkesbury rose on the order of the day for going into a Committee on the Local Militia Bill. He considered it a permanent national system, calculated to give more effect to the volunteers, and provide effectually for the defence of the country.

The Earl of Selkirk supported the principles of the Bill, but objected to several provisions in it, particularly the pay- ment of fines for exemption.

The Earl of Moira considered the volunteers slighted by the observations which had fallen from a Noble Lord (Hawkes- bury). He considered the volunteers entitled to the gratitude of the country for their uniform loyalty and patriotism. He had seen the volunteers of Scotland, and he should feel no hesi- tation to command them against any force that might invade the country. If the volunteers in the South of England were not so well disciplined, it was because they had not been properly called upon to qualify themselves. As they stood, under all the present circumstances, he considered them preferable to men raised by the Local System.

Lord Hawkesbury in explanation assured the Noble Baron who had sat down last, that he never intended to cast the slightest disrespect on the Volunteers.

The House went into a Committee, and after a long discus- sion on the several clauses of the Bill, the Report was ordered to be received on Monday.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, JUNE 16.

On the motion of Mr. Rose, the Cinque Port Pilot's Bill was re-committed.

On the motion of the same Right Hon. Gentleman, for vesting in the power of the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports the ap- pointment of sixty additional Pilots for Dover and the Isle of Thanet, the Committee divided, when the Clause was carried in the affirmative.

ROYAL MESSAGE.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer delivered to the House a Message from his Majesty, the same as usual at the close of every Session, for the accustomed Vote of Credit toward the incidental exceedings of the year in the defence of the coun- try.—Referred to the Committee of Supply.

The order of the day being read for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of Supply, and a motion being made for re- ferring thereto, amongst other subjects, the Petition of the India Company, praying aids; it was opposed by several Members, The question, however, was carried in the affirmative.

Mr. Dundas Saunders resumed the subject of India Affairs, and observed that the sum he should move for, if granted, would carry the Company through their difficulties, without any fur- ther aid from the Public; and he moved that the sum of 1,500,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, to enable his Majesty to pay the same to the East India Company, on account of the expences incurred by them for the Public Service in India.

After some discussion the Resolution was agreed to.

SICILIAN TREATY.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that a sum not exceeding 300,000*l.* should be granted to his Majesty, to make good the same sum stipulated in the Treaty with the King of Sicily.

Mr. Whitbread was desirous, before he could agree to this Resolution, to put a question or two to his Majesty's Ministers. He wished, in the first place, to know the origin of this treaty. There was a stipulation in it regarding the remission of duties upon articles imported from this country. Had that stipulation been already carried into effect, and were those articles admitted free of duties? It was also stipulated, that two fortresses should be occupied by us. Why was not the occupation of Milazzo, a fortress of more importance than either of those mentioned in the Treaty, not included in it?

Mr. Secretary Canning said, his Sicilian Majesty having incurred the hostility of France, on account of his adherence to us, it was our duty to give him support and assistance. After the disasters which fell upon Austria, the King of Naples was have either joined France, or sought for assistance from England. There was no alternative. The war was not therefore of his own choice, but must sooner or later have been forced upon him. The payment of the Subsidy was to commence from the period of those disasters. The subsidy was to be employed in putting Sicily into a state of defence, and bringing forward a great portion of the population of that island. As to the treaty specifying only two fortresses, and omitting that which the Hon. Member considered as more important than either of those mentioned, he would say that Milazzo was actually occupied by British troops. The reason it was not mentioned in the treaty was, that the article specified only the minimum of the force which we engaged to maintain in Sicily. Had Milazzo been included in the treaty, the number of troops must have been encreased. The question on the resolutions was then put and unanimously agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

After some observations from Mr. Windham, Sir W. Curtis, Mr. Canning, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Tierney, the sum of 50,000*l.* was granted as compensation to the Inhabitants of the town of Roseau, in the Island of Dominica, for losses sustained by the burning of the town in defending it against the enemy on the 22d of February 1806.

For the expences of the Commissioners of Military Inquiry..... £21,000
To the Commissioners for distributing American Claims 14,000
To Commissioners for the Improvement of the British Museum..... 6,000
To Commissioners for repairing Margate Harbour, in consequence of the storm on the 14th of January last 5,000
Towards improving the Harbour of Holyhead..... 10,000

When this Resolution was read, a division took place. For the Grant, Ayes 181—Against it, Noes 42.

On the motion for a grant of 75,220*l.* for the purchase of land and houses in Palace-yard,

Mr. Windham thought it necessary that the money should be spent with some common judgment and taste. He ridiculed in the happiest manner the dwarf Gothic taste which had been shewn in the new front of the House of Lords. A number of little pipes and tubes were dignified with the names of towers; and although the very idea of a tower was something that would hold men for defence, yet those things which were called towers, would not even hold one man. Nothing could be more repugnant to true taste.

Mr. Ross completely coincided with the Right Hon. Gentleman in disapproving of the new front of the House of Lords, which he thought was a specimen of such wretched taste, that, notwithstanding the money that it had cost, he hoped the Right Hon. Gentleman would agree with him, that it would be necessary to incur another expence in having it pulled down again. He disclaimed having had any thing to do with the building.

A very long discussion took place, after which the motion was agreed to.

Sir Thomas Turton moved that the sum of 54,702*l.* be given to John Palmer, Esq. as the balance on the per centage due to him from the 5th of April, 1793, until the year 1808. On the question being put, the Committee divided, and there appeared in favour of the motion 93, against it 73.

DISTILLERY BILL.

Lord H. Petty denied that any scarcity existed in the country, or at least not sufficient to originate such a measure. On a division there appeared for the third reading 74, against it 34, majority 40. The Bill then passed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved a Lottery for the service of the year, not exceeding 60,000 tickets.—Agreed to. Adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 14.

The Hare Shooting Bill, the Barracks Franking Bill, and the Irish Malt Duty Bill, were read a third time and passed.

Mr. Wharton brought up the Report of the Committee of Supply, when the various resolutions respecting the grants of Monday were read and agreed to.

On the motion of Sir A. Wellesley, the Dublin Police Bill was read a third time and passed.

The House then went into a Committee on the Duties on Welch Coals, and, on the motion of Mr. Manning, the old Duties were repealed, and certain new Duties imposed, of 1*s.* 6*d* on every ton carried coastwise.

Mr. Huskisson brought up the Coffee Duties Bill, which was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time.

DUTIES OF KING'S PROCTOR.

Sir [illegible] in consequence of the great extent of our [illegible] and from the general war in which the country was engaged, the business and the emoluments of the King's Proctor had prodigiously increased. From the commencement of the present war, more than 3000 causes had passed through his hands, the costs of each of which went into the pockets of that officer were, upon an average, 100*l.* for every cause, which amounted to considerably more than 300,000*l.* during that period. He did not complain, however, of the enormous amount of the emoluments; but he thought that the mass of duties which he had to perform was much greater than could be properly got through by one man. To remedy this evil he should propose a Resolution to the House to the following effect, namely, "That it is the opinion of this House, that the duties of the Office of King's Proctor are too great to be performed by one man;" and should follow it by another, for presenting an Address to his Majesty, praying that he would be pleased to appoint three or more Assistant Proctors, for the purpose of more speedily performing the duties of the office.

The Advocate General opposed the measure, both on the grounds of political inexpediency, and from a regard to the interests of the navy. The Office of King's Proctor was of ancient standing, like that of the Solicitor or Attorney General. With regard to all those suits in the Court of Admiralty the King was dominus litis, and it was highly important for the respectability with Foreign Powers, that the duties should be exercised by one in whom the Crown placed that confidence which could not properly be placed in a number of individuals. Besides, if Navy Agents in general were employed by the Proctors to prosecute their claims, there would be no end of vexatious proceedings. This was exemplified in the conduct of privateers, where the complaints of vexatious conduct were innumerable. It was therefore important that the King's Proctor should have no competitor, else it would be productive of needless vexation to neutrals.

Mr. Martin supported the motion at some length. He was certain that the navy in general had imbibed the same opinion on the subject of the office of King's Proctor with his Friend. There was one evil of which they had to complain, namely, that the King's Proctor was totally independent of Proctors, and thus captains in the navy were in a worse situation than those of privateers, who could employ their own agents, and the fact was, that cases of captures in the plantations were generally five, and sometimes ten years before they were determined. Now it was only proposed that three or more additional Proctors should be appointed, to any one of whom captains in the navy might apply. He mentioned one case in which a cause was pending from 1794 to 1801. It was certainly more reasonable that the captains of the navy should be allowed to employ a Proctor who was in some degree amenable to them, than one who was quite independent; on the whole, he should heartily concur in the present motion.

The House divided, against the motion, 35—For it, 16—Majority by a majority of 19.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZE MONEY WITH ALLIES.

The Advocate General stated the propriety of enabling His Majesty to cause the payment of such division of prize-money as the troops of his Sicilian Majesty were deemed entitled to, as they had co-operated with the British forces against the common enemy. He observed, that the best mode to be adopted for that purpose would be, to have the money advanced here to the Minister of that Sovereign residing at our Court, to be by him transmitted to his Master for distribution accordingly.

The Hon. Gentleman then moved for leave to bring in a Bill to extend the powers of the 47th of the King, for the payment and distribution of prize money to foreign states and foreign ships co-operating with British ships or British forces. Ordered. The Bill was read a first time.

STIPENDIARY CURATES.

On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the House went into a Committee on this Bill.

A variety of amendments were moved by different Members and some were adopted, and others withdrawn, but the Committee did not divide on any.

The Speaker proposed a clause to be inserted, granting relief to persons against whom an order should be made by the Bishop, enabling them to appeal against it to the King in Council, who should be at liberty to confirm or reverse the sentence as might seem best.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed a clause whereby Delegates or Commissioners should be appointed by the King, by a warrant under the Great Seal, who should have authority to make such decisions as should be conclusive in all appeals that should come before them.

PRIVATELY STEALING BILL.

Burton opposed the Bill, as being of a dangerous ten- by holding out to the world, that capital punishments nconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution. The d Member entered into a series of observations upon the to which crimes of burglaries, pick-pocketing, shop- and almost every species of offence, had arrived at; in which the ingenuity of committing the act privately con- l the offence of the mischief. He was afraid the Bill operate as a proclamation of impunity to offenders, un- e punishment to be introduced into the Bill were made nsurate with the crime.
A. Piggot defended the principle of the Bill. In this he ined that he was supported not only by 250 years experience, o by the assertions of Mr. Justice Blackstone, and a late, philosophic a person, the Learned Archdeacon Paley, all m shew that the penalty of death does not prevent, the ation of the crime.
Leycester said, that several Hon. Members seemed ra- mistake the practice, as it prevailed, relative to the pu- nt of offenders of the description mentioned in this Bill. dges could have no possible wish to carry the law to its remity, and it was always with reluctance and sorrow ey complied with the severity of our capital punishments, delivering the wretched culprit to the execution of the ut he appealed to the good sense and humanity of the whether it would not be better to let the law remain as d leave in the breast of the Judges that discretionary which, for so long a period, they have exercised with , justice, and mercy, rather than divest them of it now, by doing so, that terror is removed, labouring under has prevented the increase of crimes to that extent which se they would have reached, if those wise and salutary d not checked them. The l Gentleman concluded with stating his decided disappro- of the Bill in its present shape.

Sir Samuel Romilly said, that as so much objection was made to the preamble, although in his mind it conveyed a truism, yet he had no objection to forego it, rather than endanger the Bill; at present, from the severity of the statute, it became almost a dead letter, for between the compunction and compassion of prosecutors, witnesses, juries, and judges, many offenders escaped punishments, and the prospects thereby afforded of the many evident, as well as accidental circumstances, that led either to acquittal or escape, only encouraged the commission of offences, till they became so numerous and so bold, that they reached the most enormous crimes at last, and society therefore was infinitely more injured and exposed by this law than without it. The Hon. and Learned Gentleman concluded with citing Blackstone in support of his arguments, and trusted that the House would entertain the Bill. The question was then put and carried without a division. The House then proceeded in a Committee on the Bill.
The Solicitor General then proposed an amendment, making it felony to steal from the person of another without that degree of force that constitutes robbery; leaving, however, the precise degree of punishment, in some measure, to the discretion of the Judge, and making the highest degree of punishment for this species of crime transportation for life. But he also proposed, that it should be in the discretion of the Court to inflict, in certain circumstances, the punishment of only seven years transportation; and for younger culprits, he should propose confinement in the common jail for a period not less than three years. He then proposed to submit a preamble, stating only, that "Whereas the said Act has not been found effectual to the prevention of the crimes therein mentioned, that it should be repealed; and whereas the taking from the person of any man without such force as is sufficient to constitute the crime of robbery, should be punished more severely than simple larceny, the person convicted, and all his aiders and abettors, shall be liable to be transported for life, &c."
Sir S. Romilly objected to the clause; but as it seemed to meet the general sentiment of the Committee, he should not divide the House upon it. He coincided in the opinion as to the inefficacy of limited transportation, and lamented that the Act for establishing a Penetentiary on the principle suggested by Mr. Bentham, had never been carried into execution.
The House then went into a Committee, and the Solicitor-General brought up his clause, which was read pro forma, and made part of the Bill.

SPAIN.

Mr. Sheridan said, an idea seemed to have gone abroad, that he intended to submit some specific proposition with regard to the subject; but he desired it to be distinctly understood, that he did not mean to prescribe any thing whatever to Ministers as to the conduct they should pursue; he meant nothing more than to call the attention of the House to the interesting situation of Spain at the present moment, and it was far from being his design to lecture the Government on the subject. He was sorry that any thing like an expectation should have been raised, that he should be so devoid of understanding and even good taste, as to think of laying down any specific plan to be pursued by Ministers with regard to the present situation of Spain. He wanted Ministers to engage in no romantic and disproportioned efforts for the deliverance of that country; yet ever since the first of the French Revolution to the present moment, if the enthusiastic spirit which had broke out in a part of Spain, extended itself like a rapid flame over the country, it struck him that there never was in all that time so great an opportunity for this country striking a bold and decisive blow for the rescue and deliverance of Europe, as at the present moment—(Hear! Hear!) He was disposed to trust that Ministers in general, and particularly his Right Hon. Friend, would not let slip such a glorious opportunity; and he would conjure them not to deal in driblets and in small measures, as had been too often done by this country. They ought to do much, or they should do nothing at all. He was sorry to say, that not one single Cabinet of which he had any knowledge, ever existed in this country, that followed one single object in their plans for the deliverance of Europe. Instead of striking at the core, they were generally found nibbling at the rind; they went filching for a sugar island, while all their efforts should have been directed against the radical evil. From this general observation, however, he must certainly except the late Mr. Burke, and his Right Hon. Friend (Mr. Windham). His exhortation to Ministers then would be, do what you mean to do boldly and manfully, or not at all. Avow to the people of Spain that Britain pursues no private interests in the support of their cause; that you have nothing in view of what may be called the British interests, but that your only object is the deliverance of Spai and of the world from the most unprincipled aggression and tyranny—(Hear! Hear!) He did not mean that the spirit of this country should be exalted to any romantic excess of exertion; if the flame of patriotic zeal burnt so high in the people of Spain, as he trusted it did, all he wanted was, that it should be met and nourished with corresponding ardour by Minister. The career of Bonaparte had been hitherto most victorious, because directed against nations indifferent to their Government, against Ministers without wisdom, and Princes who depended on hereditary descent, rather than talents or energy. That tyrant had yet to learn what it was to fight against a people united by patriotic zeal, and determined to risk every thing in defence of their independence. He certainly wished to leave Ministers entirely to their own discretion, as to the mode and extent of the assistance which they proposed to give; but let it not be said, on that account, that the present agitation of the question was vain or unnecessary. He did think the present a most important crisis, which should not be permitted to pass; always assuming, that the spirit of enthusiasm in support of their independence was general on the part of the people of Spain. Mr. Sheridan concluded with moving, "That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, praying that he would be pleased to lay before the House Copies of such Proclamations as had been received in this country, whether proceeding from the common enemy, or from persons claiming to act in behalf of the people of Spain.

Mr. Secretary Canning said, that with regard to the motion now before the House, he believed that his Right Honourable Friend would not be much disappointed when he said it was quite impossible for Government, in its official capacity, to produce the papers which had been moved for, both because some of them could not be considered as regularly authenticated, and because others of them purported to proceed from persons, of whom it could not be known that they were accurately designated. Such a disclosure and communication of papers, therefore, he believed, the House would concur with him in thinking would be highly improvident. The chief object which his Right Honourable Friend had in view, seemed to be, to call forth some disclosure of the general feelings and sentiments of Ministers, with regard to the late interesting events in Spain; and he had no hesitation in saying, that he and his colleagues beheld, with as lively an emotion as the Right Honourable Gentleman himself could feel, the stand which had been made, by at least a part of the Spanish people, against the unexampled oppression of France, and that there was every disposition on the part of his Majesty's Government, to afford the utmost aid which this country could put forth in a struggle so magnanimous (hear! hear!) While the people of Spain are actuated by a spirit of resistance to the unprovoked aggression of the Ruler of France, it could not for a moment be supposed that Ministers should consider them as in a state of warfare with this country. To oppose the overwhelming power of France was the main object of our exertions, and whoever joined us in that opposition, from that moment became essentially, and to all intents and purposes our friend (hear! hear!). The objects of this country, in affording aid to the patriots of Spain could only be these, to unite our common efforts against a common enemy, to support the interests and independence of Spain, and, lastly, to promote the accomplishment of British objects; though this last he should consent to leave out, provided the two former could in any degree be attained; though in fact all must be aware, that whatever tended to set bounds to the power of France must be essentially in itself a British interest. These were the feelings and sentiments which actuated Ministers, and which they wished to communicate to the House and to the country. It was, therefore, on the whole, from no disrespect to his Right Honourable Friend, that he wished him to withdraw his motion, but rather from a view of the inexpedience, and, indeed, impossibility, of complying with it, on the part of his Majesty's Government. The motion was then withdrawn.

FOREIGN PROPERTY.

Mr. Bankes moved, preparatory to the discussion on this subject, that accounts of dividends relating to stock possessed by foreigners in the Bank, &c. should be laid before the House, and submitted to the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The question was put and negatived without a division—Adjourned.

Sharpe Powell spoke in support of the second reso-
. He entered into a long and very able review of the ous facts and circumstances attending the deposition of the h of the Carnatic, and, from a review of the whole case, received himself justified in pronouncing it an act of unjustiambition, hardly to be paralleled by any of those acts of ace which we had lately witnessed on the Continent of pe. This resolution, therefore, should meet with his de-support, inasmuch as it expressed those ideas of British y which, in his opinion, ought to be pursued, and pledged untry to afford that redress to the injured sufferers, which now within their power.

RD Castlereagh conceived that the House, after a deli-e examination during two separate discussions, had already en a fair decision in negativing the charge of injustice and quity. Did the Learned Gentleman think that by the which he had endavoured to make out, he should be able duce the House to revise the vote and decision which they already come to? The Noble Lord then adverted to the length of time during which the charge was suspended.
Noble Lord then entered upon a long reply, contending, even previous to the examination of the witnesses, Lord esley had made up his mind with regard to the treasonable edings of the Arcot Family. He conceived that a Govern-might justifiably adopt a great measure of policy, though were not prepared, nor perhaps able to prove the hostile ions of the enemy by such proofs as were admissible in a t of Justice. The Noble Lord then adverted to the letters passed between the Nabob Wallajah and Tippoo Saib, he contended were of a political nature, and hostile to Indian interests. With regard to the reasons of this herous correspondence with Tippoo, he was disposed to be them to impatience of British influence that was not the line of policy pursued by the Marquis of Wellesley respect to the Carnatic, and concluded by giving his de-

PROVINCIALS.

WOBURN SHEEP SHEARING.

nday morning, about 11 o'clock, a numerous company of guished agriculturists and gentlemen farmers, assembled at ark Farm, Woburn. The morning was employed in view e South Down and Leicester sheep, the property of his e the Duke of Bedford, which were to be sold in the ng. At three o'clock the company repaired to the Abbey ritake of a most elegant dinner, where the utmost conviy prevailed. Immediately after dinner, the Committee of Agriculturists of England retired to the room where the field Club had in the morning held an adjourned meeting, range the necessary measures for the Christmas show, and after retired to the Great Hall, preceded by Mr. Thomas, silversmith, bearing the large embossed silver salver of plate presented to his Grace the Duke of Bedford. The salver placed on the table before his Grace, the whole company rose, and Lord Somerville addressed him in an appropriate speech, to which the Duke made an animated reply.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 15.—MORNING.—View of dead Prize Sheep, South Down, and Devon cattle.—Sheep-shearing parties to view the Speedwell and Park Farm crops, &c.—Examination of threshing mills and various other implements of husbandry exhibited in the Park Farm-yard for the prize.—Sale of South Down ewes and theaves, some pens of both sorts reaching 3*l.* 15*s.* a head. A numerous body about three o'clock were again regaled at a plentiful dinner in the Great Hall. His Grace distributed the several prizes as they were classed, by the adjudications therein, viz.

For the best Long-Wool Wether.—1st. Prize cup, value ten guineas, to Mr. John Barton. 2d. Ditto ditto, value five guineas, to Edward Flatt.

For Ditto Theaves.—1st. Prize cup, same value, John Butfield. 2d. Ditto ditto, ditto, James Cowley.

For the best Short Wool, Wethers.—1st. Prize cup, same value, Robert Trevor. 2d. Ditto ditto, ditto, Mr. Runsemain.

For the best Ditto, Theaves.—1st. Prize cup, same value, Robert Trevor, Esq. 2d. Ditto ditto, ditto, Thomas ——, Esq.

For the best Plough.—The prize cup of ten guineas to the Duke of Bedford, for a Northumberland plough. Two guineas to John Green, who held the same plough. His Grace, as usual, presented the prize cup adjudged at his plough, to his bailiff, Mr. Wilson.

For the best Roar.—Prize cup, five guineas, Earl of Upper Ossory. Best Shearer, five guineas, J. Barnard; and four prizes, three, two, and one guineas, to the four next best. The Bedfordshire Shepherd who saved the greatest number of lambs, five guineas, John Clark; and four subordinate prizes to others as to Shearers. The premium of 30 guineas to the Bedfordshire Farmer who shall produce the best account of comparative trials between broadcast and drill husbandry.—Adjudged to be postponed till after harvest.

The premium of 50 Guineas for irrigating in Bedfordshire the largest number of acres (not less than ten) between Jan. 1, and June 1, 1808.—No claimant. [illegible] Cowley had irrigated 17 acres, but some by the method called catch work, which is not estimated the best mode of irrigation. But to encourage the exhibition of implements, they recommended the premium of twenty guineas to be divided as follows:—To Mr. Pasmoor, for his chaff-cutter and bean-splitter, three guineas; Mr. Shepherd, for a frame applied to Mr. Salmon's threshing machine, to allow its erecting in the field; Mr. Bachelor's improvement of a drill machine of Mr. Salmon's, which gained a premium some years ago, five guineas; Mr. Bowman, seven guineas, for his whalebone, as a substitute, in some cases, for fencing, &c. Which recommendation his Grace adopted.

The Judges were, for the Sheep—Lord Somerville, Mr. Boyce, and Mr. ——; for the Ploughs, and Implements of Husbandry—J. C. Curwen, Esq. Rev. H. B. Dudley, and Mr. Howard; for Swine—C. C. Western, Esq. Mr. Ellman, and Mr. T. Crook.

MANCHESTER, JUNE 15.—Parties of the weavers again assembled yesterday, at and near the New Cross, and in Newtonlane; but they dispersed peaceably, after being cautioned by the General sent hither to command the troops (Sir C. Ross, I believe) who humanely advised them to return to their employment, lest a contrary conduct should subject them to disagreeable consequences. Every thing has been tranquil during this day. Yesterday, it is generally reported and believed, a large body of refractory weavers met upon Cheadle Moss, and indicated rather a riotous disposition; but the appearance of a troop of cavalry produced the effect of dispersing them, though not until several men had been apprehended. A weaver from Ashton-under-line, with whom I conversed this morning, informs me that nearly all the workmen in that town and neighbourhood have returned to their looms, and that all is again as quiet as before the disputes commenced. From other places similar accounts are brought in hourly; so that it is hoped the business is drawing to an amicable close. Not only our Magistrates and Civil Officers, but the Military stationed here, merit every possible praise for their unremitting exertions during this disagreeable dispute. They have, in every instance, displayed the utmost humanity and perseverance.

TROTTING-MATCH.—It has been made known, that a horse, the property of Mr. Progers, which a few weeks since was sold for seven guineas, was backed to trot seventeen miles in one hour. The distance has very rarely been performed, although the wonderful mare called the Phenomena, once did nineteen miles within an hour. The stake for this match was two hundred and fifty pounds to one hundred. The horse started with a seven stone jockey at eight o'clock yesterday morning, at Holloway Green, Herts, to go over some picked ground. The animal west half the distance in two minutes above half the time, and the next two miles was performed at a winning rate. After the horse had done twelve miles he began to lag, and the match was lost after fourteen miles had been performed in forty-two minutes.

The present season promises to be the greatest for fruit ever remembered in this kingdom. As the fruit trees did not blossom till the spring was nearly over, no frost or nipping blasts followed to destroy them in the bud. This is certainly but a secondary object in our vegetation, but we may likewise anticipate a plentiful summer, and an abundant harvest.

SATURDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

A PROCLAMATION,

Revoking the former Proclamations relating to the Distribution of Prizes, and appointing a new Distribution thereof:

GEORGE R.

Whereas it has been represented to Us, that it will be productive of beneficial effects, if, instead of the three-eighth of the produce of prizes hitherto granted to the captains and flag officers in our fleet, two-eighths only shall be allotted to them, and the remaining eighth distributed amongst the petty officers, seamen, and marines, in addition to their present shares; We do therefore hereby revoke our several Proclamations heretofore issued, concerning the Distribution of Prizes taken by ships: Provided that the Distribution hereinafter made shall not be construed to affect any prizes captured before the day of the date of this Proclamation, nor any prizes captured after that day, and condemned before notice of this Proclamation shall have been received by the Court in which such condemnation shall pass; and We hereby declare, that the produce of prizes captured before the day of the date of this Proclamation, or shall be captured that day, and condemned in any antecedent to the notice of this Proclamation having been received in such Court, shall continue to be distributed in the proportions directed by former Proclamations; and our will and pleasure is, that the net produce of all prizes taken, the right whereof is inherent in us and our Crown, be given to the taker, except the produce of prizes taken by vessels belonging to our Commissioners of Customs or Excise, the disposition of which we reserve to our further pleasure, and also except as after mentioned; but subject to the payment of all such Customs and Duties as the same are now or would have been liable to if the same were or might have been imported as merchandize; and that the same may be so given in the proportion and manner hereinafter set forth, that is to say,

That all prizes taken by vessels having letters of marque and reprizals, (except prizes taken by the vessels belonging to our Commissioners aforesaid) may be disposed of by the merchants, and others, to whom such letters are granted, for their own use after final adjudication, and not before.

And we further order, that the net produce of prizes taken by any of our vessels of war, except when they shall be acting on any conjunct expedition with our army, in which case ve to ourselves the distribution of all prize taken; and also t as after mentioned, shall be for the entire benefit and ragement of our flag officers, captains, commanders, and commissioned officers in our pay, and of the seamen, maand soldiers on board our vessels at the time of the cap-and that such prizes may be lawfully disposed of by them heir agents after the same shall have been to Us finally add lawful prize, and not otherwise.

e remainder of this Proclamation directs the exact proporing which the Distribution of these Prizes shall take place g the Officers and Seamen: the whole net produce being ivided into eight equal parts.

THE LITERATI

Are respectfully informed, that Le Beau Monde, or Literary and Fashionable Magazine, has obtained the reputation of being the most classical, as well as the most splendid Monthly Publication extant—and that it may continue the most perfect Literary Work of the age, the Proprietors will, for the future, appropriate a portion of its pages to the Original Communications of Correspondents, which are earnestly entreated, and will be punctually inserted, if found consistent with the plan of the Magazine.—Office, No. 11, Catherine-street, Strand.

THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

London,

SUNDAY, JUNE 19, 1808.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

In The Gazette of last night, is a Proclamation from his MAJESTY, by which, with a most splendid and truly Royal liberality, he gives up all his share in the prizes captured by our vessels to be divided among naval men for the encouragement of the service. This munificent action needs no comment from us: it will speak more forcibly than words to the hearts of our countrymen.

A great number of reports have been spread through the country during the whole of the last week, on the subject of the Spanish affairs. Some persons said that Admiral PURVIS and General SPENCER, who were lying off Cadiz, had landed their troops, and been received with open arms: that the Spanish fleet had been surrendered to them in trust, and the French fleet as a prize. Others asserted, that General SPENCER in an attempt to land, had been repulsed with heavy loss. Others again declared, that General SPENCER had landed, and suddenly withdrawn without loss, on the discovery of treacherous designs against our troops. However, this was not supposed likely to influence the negociations between Admiral PURVIS and General SOCORA.

Another Deputy has arrived from Spain: he says that Biscay has joined the provinces of Gallicia and Asturias, which provinces, all united, have now 150,000 men in arms. He adds that no actual insurrection has taken place in Ferrol. It is supposed that the spirit of patriotism has manifested itself at Carthagena.

The Bishop of Oviedo publicly encourages the Patriots in their struggle with the power of France; and some private letters from Gijon pretend, which we are very unwilling to believe, that the PRINCE of ASTURIAS has issued a proclamation at Bayonne, encouraging the people to emancipate themselves.

On the 19th of last month, MURAT issued a proclamation from Madrid, in which, as President of the Junta, or Council of State, he directed that all the different Provinces of Spain should, without loss of time, send deputations to Bayonne, to consist of certain Grandees, named in the proclamation, Archbishops, Bishops, and others, who possess influence in the country. These were directed to assemble at Bayonne on the 15th of June, to receive in form from the EMPEROR NAPOLEON, a new Constitutional Code, by which the future Government of Spain was to be governed. It was the publication of this document at Oviedo, that determined the Patriots of Asturias to resist the tyranny of the invaders.

Private letters state that BONAPARTE has prevailed upon the QUEEN of SPAIN to sign a Declaration of the illegitimacy of the PRINCE of ASTURIAS; and that 100,000 French troops were on their march to Madrid. An order has also been issued for the restitution of the whole of the property of the PRINCE of the PEACE in the kingdom of Spain.

The declaration of the Prince's illegitimacy was considered necessary to counteract any sentiments that might be favourable to him.

The Spanish troops in the North of Germany, w to have partaken the feeling of their brethren in S said to have been divided into small detachments, parated from their own officers: and it is suppo the French entertain apprehension not only t troops should become troublesome, but also lest niards should adopt measures hostile to France, i gal, where there are nineteen Spanish regiments, twelve French.

We have seen no reason to change the opinions hazarded in our last Number on the succour of Sp ARTHUR WELLESLEY, it seems, is to command an tion for the assistance of that country. The troop is to command are lying at Cork. They are com the 5th, 9th, 38th, 40th, and 91st Regiments of L 5th Battalion of the 60th, and 4th Royal Veteran B Major-General HILL is to be second in comman whom will be Brigadier-Generals FANE and CRAW

We cannot look forward to the employment forces without sensations of great uneasiness. Eng always been too ready to interfere in every co quarrel, and hope the overthrow of an empire discontent of a province. As the information w determined Ministers to send out such an arm Spain has not been made public, no decided opi be formed of its expediency. Policy and prudenc alone direct our measures of assistance to the Sp certainly we are not bound by honour, for we hav alliance nor faith with Spain.

The news from America is not of a nature very able to the interests of this country. The House o sentatives have passed a string of Resolutions whic to be friendly to the cause of the French Empe which we have given in detail under the head of news. We have so long been fluctuating betwee vour and the enmity of the Americans, that a lit nation of the balance to one side or the other ma little difference in our hopes or fears. Indeed we sure that at last the question signifies so much a imagine. Till America acquires a naval power, scarcely injure us: for her continental territory, vast, is too remote to affect the balance of power continent of Europe, or give occasion for the alarm on the shores of Great Britain.

There is no decisive intelligence from the North skirmishes have taken place: but they have es nothing. Our Expedition seems still to be inacti certainly difficult to imagine how a contingency consequence as to paralize a force so formidable now in the Baltic, could be out of the minds of th sent it there. We hope the explanation will not our confirmed deficiency of character in the pla Expeditions.

The approaching recess of Parliament will, it i ed, be much shorter than usual.—Both Houses, i posed, will be called together again in October.

Preparations have been made at Plymouth for co home all the Spanish prisoners who are natives of vinces now in arms against Bonaparte. A number venue cutters have been collected at Plymouth, and under the command of the Port Admiral, to be e as transports for the Spaniards in Mill Prison.—O day orders were received at Chatham from the C sioners for Prisoners of War, directing the Spani board the prison ships in the Medway to be relea delivered to persons appointed to take charge of t their return to their own country.

The following stores have been already shipped f Royal Arsenal, at Woolwich, for Spain:—30,000 arms, 600 tons of ammunition, four millions of l tridges, with entrenching tools, artillery, &c.

Dutch papers and letters to the 11th inst. arrived day. The only intelligence of importance they co aughter, the Countess of Harrington, Ladies C. Wally gratifying in the present perilous conjuncture to patriotic exertions of the wealth and rank of this —this is a reflection to which we are unavoidably led ng in that popular print, The Morning Post, the ulation of our landed interest in the art of jockey-period when we are enjoying such harmony at home, ed by no apprehensions from abroad, such pursuit highest degree commendable, and speak more than e dignified spirit by which they are promoted: no habitants of Manchester must peruse with grateful t this moment, an account of my Lord B—— pro- y two thousand guineas for a two year old filly, and —— gloriously panegyrised for the foundation of hich has for its object to convert gentlemen into ers into hackney-coachmen, and bad baronets into oteers!!! This, however, is a consideration which ceding to treat too ludicrously—there is not perhaps tain indications of a nation's decline than, among its ers, this apathy to danger and this attention to e ancient Rome fell from splendour to insignificance, e ardour, which caused her elevation, dwindled into for the frivolities of fashion: her senatorial dignitaries flourished the spear of the Gladiator, while the prime o her nobility, with her emperor at their head, like our modern worthies, staked thousands on a chariot race, to be contested by themselves, with no other hope to the nation than that their necks would be broken before they reached the distance post.

These are considerations which we hope the Rival Whip Clubs may employ some person to read to them, who at the same time may hint, that as they whirl their own servants through Bond-street, the thinking few wish heartily they had been placed by Providence in the station of the dethroned coachmen, who sit snugly within, despising the insignificance of their masters as gentlemen, and sneering at their continual blunders as drivers.

Another elopement has taken place in high life. A Noble Viscount, Lord S——, has gone off with a Lady, Mrs. P.——, whose husband is a relation of the Marquis of W——. It is not known to what place the fugitives have withdrawn.

A change in the Ministry is rumoured as probable—we understand Doctor Duigenan and Mr. Foster are to be sent to the House of Lords, under the titles of Lord Maynooth, senior and junior.

The main object of Mr. Sheridan's motion in the House of Commons for assisting Spain, was, it is said, the ultimate redemption of Oporto.

CITY.

A Court of Aldermen was held on Tuesday at Guildhall, at which fifteen Aldermen, the Recorder, and City Officers were present. The Lord Mayor delivered the returns of the Ward-motes held before him, for the election of Aldermen of the Wards of Walbrook and Coleman-street, in the room of Thomas Rowcroft and Richard Lea, Esqrs. resigned, declaring John Atkins, Esq. to be duly elected; and they attending, were sworn into their offices, and took their seats in the Court.

BREAD.—The Court, on inspecting the meal-weigher's returns, ordered the price of bread to be raised half an assize, which makes the quartern loaf, wheaten, 12½*d.* and household 10½*d.*

Friday, the freedom of the city of London, with a sword of 100 guineas value, some time since voted by the Corporation of London to Admiral Sir J. T. Duckworth, K. B. was presented to that Officer at Guildhall, by the Chamberlain, in the presence of the Lord Mayor, Mr. Alderman Shaw (in whose Mayoralty the Resolution passed), Mr. Alderman Birch, &c. &c.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the India House, when Capt. Tremenheere was sworn into the command of the ship Asia.—The Court adjourned at six o'clock till Wednesday next.

The Royal Family, and Ladies and Gentlemen of Distinction and fashion, use the Original Russia Oil, for moistening the Hair when dressing, which is so great a nourisher to the Hair, as to prevent it turning grey to all periods of life; promotes the growth; prevents its falling off; and restores it on bald places, if the least roots remain. Several Gentlemen that were bald have declared, after using the Russia Oil regularly for three months, the bald places became nearly covered with hair. Caution.—As noxious counterfeits are selling in petty shops, and, to deceive, have imitated the Russian Eagle on the shew bills and covers, purchasers will therefore be particular in observing, that each bottle of the Original Russian Oil has a label on the outside wrapper, signed in Russian gold ink, "Mochrikufsky and Prince;" may without that signature are counterfeits. Ladies and Gentlemen going to Watering-places ought not to neglect, after bathing, to use the Russian Oil, as it prevents the general case of the water occasioning the hair to fall off and become shaded. Also Gentlemen should not omit applying it to the whiskers to prevent them turning grey, which is too generally experienced on the account of the constant wetting they receive from shaving: this case is clearly proved, as the whiskers, eye-brows, &c. at 7s. per bottle, or a bottle containing four small, at One Guinea. THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

On Wednesday evening the Haymarket Theatre opened with the drama of the Castle Spectre, the work of Mr. M. G. Lewis. It is fortunate for the fame of this poet, that the Castle Spectre is not the only literary production by which he is known to the public; for a more wild, incoherent, bombastic piece of conversation, is not to be found among the most eccentric fancies of the allegorical dramatists who entertained the wits in the time of Henry the Eighth, or among the rhyming play-wrights who blustered in the reign of Charles the Second. The plot is the plot of a ballet pantomime: the dialogue is the dialogue of Bedlam: the characters are the characters of every bad novel: a broad series of black and white splashes, all very detestable, or very penitent, or very interesting. What can be said in praise of such a play?

The character of Osmond was performed by Mr. Young. That this gentleman's tragic powers are entitled to considerable respect, it would be unjust in us to deny; but whatever we may think of his general ability, we cannot speak in very high praise of this individual performance. If, indeed, it be the business of an actor to seize so completely the spirit of his author as to make a play extravagantly written appear more extravagant by being extravagantly acted, then the style in which Mr. Young played the great scene in the Castle Spectre on Wednesday night, is certainly entitled to the loftiest commendation. But, if it be the business of an actor to soften his author's failings, and improve the beauties of the text, we fear Mr. Young cannot be considered as deserving the highest approbation.

The scene in the character of Osmond, which is usually called the great scene, is that in which he relates his dream to the two black slaves. He enters, having started in all the convulsions of terror from his couch, and at the moment when he rushes into the arms of the slaves, has scarcely convinced himself that his visions have been but fallacious. He his completely exhausted by the violent operation of his fears: with difficulty he sustains himself as he relates the story to the slaves; and now and then so totally does he feel his force desert him, that he is compelled to lean upon one of these attendants for assistance.

All this Mr. Young recited in a noisy declamatory style, more suitable to the rage of Bajazet, than the terror of Osmond. One or two bursts of horror may be fairly permitted in such a situation as this, in order to give the advantage of contrast to the effects of feeble terror, which constitute the general character of the scene; but these bursts should be only momentary, and ought to be succeeded by a still increasing degree of debility, arising from exhausted stimulus. No part of this series of emotions did Mr. Young pourtray in such a manner as by any chance to remind us of nature. Mr. Young is considered to be an actor of infinite art: it may be so, and we are among the foremost to inculcate the necessity of art in acting, as well as in every other science: but the business of art is to assist, not to violate nature. Mr. Young does not seem to put himself in the situation of the person of whom he represents, and say: "How "should I feel if this were my case?" And yet there are two or three parts in which Mr. Young displays excellences of a very superior description, so that he must needs possess this faculty of imagining nature: and we have only to regret that possessing such a faculty, he does not oftener exercise it.

Mrs. Bellamy, late of the Belfast Theatre, played Angela. This lady was Miss Grist, several years an actress of consideration in the Covent-garden company; she has since married Mr. Bellamy of Covent-garden, who was lately Manager of the Belfast Theatre. It would be dangerous for us to speak with any certainty upon the merits of an actress whom we have seen only in this part; for there is scarcely a character of importance in the whole circle of the drama, which is important with so little character as Angela. It is impossible to say what Angela properly is. She is sometimes a coward and sometimes a bully: she is sometimes all sweetness and gentle timidity; then she scolds the nurse, blusters at Osmond, and elopes under care of the friar. All that we can venture to declare positively is, that Mrs. Bellamy seems to have the externals of a good actress: the power of expressing different appearances of emotion, and the art of moving with grace. But as the emotions that are to be expressed in the part of Angela are so contradictory as to afford little probability that an actress, or any human being ever felt them, we do not expect an actress to do more than frown, and smile, and weep, and shout; all of which operations Mrs. Bellamy has evidently stage knowledge enough to perform with judgment. But the great criterions of fine acting are, nice discriminations of character, and delicate but forcible touches of feeling; there is no opportunity for these in Angela: and therefore we cannot decide whether Mrs. Bellamy's powers be really of a very superior order. As far as we are able to judge, we are inclined to judge favourably. We shall probably be in a condition to form a better estimate of her merits when we have seen her play Mrs. Haller in The Stranger, which is advertised for to-morrow night.

DRURY-LANE.

On Friday evening Drury-lane theatre closed for the season, with the comedy of The Belle's Stratagem, and the farce of No Song no Supper. Between the play and the entertainment Mr. Wroughton delivered an address, which was in substance nearly as follows:—

"I am deputed, Ladies and Gentlemen, by the Proprietors "of this theatre, to express to you their humble and heartfelt "thanks for the liberal encouragement which you have afford-"ed to them through the season that has now elapsed: and at "the same time to assure you, in the strongest manner, that they "are determined, by the most uninterrupted attention, to prove "themselves worthy of the patronage they have received. Un-"der these impressions, they will employ the ensuing summer "in the preparation of such dramatic pieces in every depart-"ment, as they may consider most likely to afford you gratifi-"cation. We, the Performers, one and all, beg leave to offer "to you our deepest acknowledgments for the indulgence which "you have constantly granted us: an indulgence, to merit the "continuance of which is our highest ambition and our best re-"ward. We now take our leaves of you till next September."

This address was received with great applause; for the people know so little of theatres, that they actually believe the Proprietors mean what they say, or cause to be said. The Proprietors hold a patent from the Crown for the good of the people, and they tell the people that they mean to use it for the people's good: but they really mean, if we may judge of the future by the past, to use it only for their own good. This reproach is not peculiar to Drury-lane: of the two theatres we believe Drury-Lane, to be directed in the more public-spirited and generous manner; but the power is too great to be trusted to chance, or to one chance-chosen individual. For it is well known that Mr. Wroughton and Mr. Kemble, and all the committee, and part proprietors, and boards of management, and other persons interested in the theatres, have in fact no full controul: that full controul, in both theatres, rests on an equally dangerous basis. In Drury-lane, it rests in total uncertainty, for nobody knows who is efficient proprietor. In Covent-garden, the full controul rests upon a still more alarming certainty, for every body feels who is efficient proprietor.

EXHIBITION AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

1. The offer of the Crown to Lady Jane Gray, by the Duke of Northumberland and Suffolk, and other Lords, Deputies of the Privy Council. J. S. COPLEY, R. A.

"Northumberland found that farther dissimulation was fruit-"less: he went to Sion House, accompanied by the Duke of "Suffolk, the Earl of Pembroke, and others of the nobility: "and he approached the Lady Jane, who resided there, with all "the respect usually paid to the Sovereign. Jane was in a "great measure ignorant of all their transactions; and it was "with equal grief and surprise that she received intelligence of "them. Her heart, full of a passion for literature, and the elegant "arts, and of tenderness towards her husband, who was deserv-"ing of her affection, had never opened itself to the flattering al-"lurements of ambition; and the information of her advancement "to the throne was by no means agreeable to her. She even "refused to accept of the present: pleaded the preferable right "of the two princesses: expressed her dread of the conse-"quences attending an enterprize so dangerous, not to say, "criminal: and desired to remain in that private station in "which she was born. Overcome at last with the importu-"nities, rather than reasons, of her father and father-in-law, and "above all, of her husband, she submitted to their will, and "was prevailed on to reliquish her own judgment.

Hume's History of England, Vol. IV. chap. 36.

From so long a text as that which Mr. Copley has here selected, we expected a composition of no ordinary merits. But we cannot pretend to have received any very exalted delight from the picture: and on seeing so much written about a picture which we could not help considering so little worth, we took the trouble of investigating the prolix motto with great care-

LAW REPORT.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, JUNE 16.

AT GUILDHALL, BEFORE MR. JUSTICE GROSE, AND A SPECIAL JURY.

THE KING v. WHITE and JOHN HARRIET HART.

an information filed by his Majesty's Attorney Gene- the two Defendants, one the Editor, and the other the of "The Independent Whig," Sunday Newspaper, for ls on Mr. Justice Le Blanc, and the Juries who tried nd Bennett, two Slave Captains lately tried and ac- the Old Bailey, for alleged murders, on two persons espective crews.' The information alleged that the published by the Defendants with a view to have it hat those two persons were unjustly acquitted, and in ing the administration of the justice of the country, ial by Jury, into hatred and contempt, and both Judge were most violently accused.

ney-General, who led the prosecution, stated the e two cases for which Bennett and Chapman were first was indicted for the murder of a boy of the name n, and on the trial it appeared most certainly, that he ed with great harshness to the boy, but by the evidence Medical Persons, it was stated that his death was not by that treatment, but by natural disease. The Jury, ecting under their oaths, found him Not Guilty.—With the case of Chapman, he also stood accused of murder- his crew. This case was tried after the former, and if ses who gave evidence against him had been believed, ds a clear case of murder against him. But it was proved , that those persons who gave testimony against him n mutinous; that the Surgeon, who was the principal, cted himself so badly that the Captain was obliged to porat punishment upon him; and it was also proved, witnesses had been heard conspiring together as to the hey were to give; and the Surgeon was heard to say 'That is right, let us all stick to that story, and our l be safe.') Under this evidence, the Learned Judge he Jury to decide, whether they could believe the wit- l they thought they could not safely adjudge the Pri- death upon that sort of evidence, and therefore they Not Guilty. The present Defendant, however, did word of this evidence, and only took the case on one assuming all that the witnesses had proved had been cted, he proceeded immediately to impeach the con- duct of the Learned Judge and the Jury. With respect to the Learned Judge, he could say, that if any thing exceeded the virtues of his heart it was the excellence of his understanding, and the patient assiduity with which he investigated the case of a Prisoner, and the clear and perspicuous detail which he stated to the Jury of every circumstance which ought to have weight in their minds. The Attorney-General, then, with great force, dwelt on the incalculable mischiefs which would result to the administration of justice, if Judges and Juries were indiscriminately and wantonly attacked by persons of the malignant minds of the Defendants, and if, after the most faithful discharge of their duties, they were to be represented as objects of public scorn and detestation.

The publication of the Papers being proved, the libels were read. The record of the acquittal of the two indicted persons were also put in.

Mr. Adolphus then addressed the Jury in a very able speech, in which he argued that although some of the expressions were too hasty and intemperate, yet that the whole was a fair discussion of the propriety of the verdicts given in those cases. He insisted on the right of all persons canvassing the proceedings of a Court of Justice, and cited a variety of instances, in which it had been done without any impeachment of its propriety, and he trusted the Jury would think the objectionable passages were the effusions of an honest mind, feeling on a subject in which it supposed great injustice had been done.

Mr. Attorney-General in reply examined the various passages minutely, from which he inferred it was evident the author wrote with a malignant intention, and not in the spirit of fair discussion.

Mr. Justice Grose in summing up, after having detailed the various passages in the libels, left the Jury to decide with what intention the author wrote it. The Jury retired for a few minutes, and then returned a verdict of—Guilty.

There was a second case against the same Paper for a libel on Lord Ellenborough, but it was postponed to Saturday week, owing to some mistakes in the record, which it is necessary to amend.

Friday being the first day of Trinity Term, the Judges went in procession to Westminster Hall, and the Courts were opened with the accustomed formalities; but nothing of any importance took place.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

An Admiralty Messenger, express, arrived at Plymouth on Wednesday morning, with dispatches for the Port Admiral, in consequence of which the whole of the frigates in that port were ordered to put to sea. La Seine sailed immediately on receiving the orders, and the Temeraire, of 98 guns, moved into Cawsand Bay, whence she was expected to sail on Thursday.

Orders have been sent to the principal out-ports, for the hiring of good coppered ships at 25s. per ton per month, and single bottomed ships at 20s. per ton per month, to be fitted for immediate service. Fifty thousand stand of arms, and a large quantity, about 500 tons, of ammunition, are under orders for Spain.

We have the pleasure of announcing the safe arrival of the first homeward-bound West India fleet, consisting of more than 200 sail.

PLYMOUTH, JUNE 15.—Came in last night, just as the mail coach was setting off for London, the Statira, 38, from off Ferrol, from which port she brought in here passenger a Spanish Nobleman of rank, who was immediately landed with his dispatches. Various rumours are afloat as to the object of his mission, but nothing correct or certain has yet transpired.

JUNE 16.—This morning about 400 artillery embarked on board transports in Catwater, said to be destined for some part of the Coast of Spain.

BIRTH.

DIED.

Last week, at Cockermouth, Cumberland, Mrs. Mary Hodgson, at a very advanced age, and whose truly pious character will ever be remembered and revered by a numerous circle of friends and relations.

At Llanvon, near Aberystwith, Jeremiah Davies, the Welsh Dwarf, aged 38, measuring only 46 inches in height: his person was the perfection of symmetry, which is rarely found in a dwarf. Great part of his time was spent in London, where he was well known, and to which place he intended to have walked the ensuing week.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER TWENTY-SIX.

ON THE PRESENT STATE OF SPAIN.

What News from Spain?" has been, for some time , the universal inquiry among our politicians of all ks. Did the anxiety with which this question is pro- d, proceed solely from a generous concern for those ic Patriots, who have nobly stood forth in defence of r national independance, it would be highly praisewor and an honour to those who feel and display it. Our d wishes they have every title to; our aid, as far as it be given with prudence, they ought certainly to re- e. But here we must stop. We can go no farther. us beware of being deceived: for the crisis is awful, a mistake may be productive of the most fatal conse- nces.

hat man who believes that the Spanish People, who e appealed to arms, have the smallest chance of defeat- Bonaparte (and it is an opinion which some Newspaper tors have endeavoured to inculcate) is a dupe of the t egregious, the most lamentable, the most dangerous sion. No man, accustomed to think liberally and ac- tely, who is acquainted with the relative condition of contending parties, and the warlike events of the last nteen years, can doubt for a moment the issue of the ent contest. That the brave Spaniards will unfor- tely be obliged to submit is a lamentable fact; but it ld be useless, it would be criminal to conceal, or evade conviction which assails us. The truth of this opinion will not only prove, in a few words, to the satisfaction ur readers, but we shall point out the usefulness and advantages of an early and serious attention to its im- ant consequences.

ad the Spanish troops been allowed to remain at home, vided, and entire; had they continued in possession ll their strong holds; had they fortified and guarded he passes of the Pyrennees; had the French soldiers excluded from the country; had the Spanish army fired with enthusiasm, and directed by its own Go- ment, feeble as it was; and had the brave Inhabitants ll the Provinces been regularly armed and organized, ng to fight, and not fearing to die in defence of their ntry, then, indeed, we might rationally have entertain- me hope of their being able successfully to oppose the ern Alexander.

ut when the contrary of all this is notoriously the case, n the Spanish army has been divided, expatriated, even rived of its Officers, and arms; when the French, with merous force, every day encreasing, are in undisturb- ossession of the Capital, the Government, and all the tresses; when the late King, and his intended Successor, e behaved with a pusillanimity, not only contemptible, astonishing, and surpassing all example; when the e Inhabitants of the Capital, after hundreds of their w-citizens had been butchered, have been constrained, tly, though reluctantly to submit; when almost all the Provinces have already followed their example, what can the inhabitants of two districts (Asturias and Gallicia) however brave, however Patriotic, perform? Does any man expect that they will be able to defeat the French: to march to their own capital, emancipate their country, and drive the French invaders beyond the Pyrennees? No. Such hopes cannot be seriously entertained, for a moment, by any man, in the smallest degree, capable of estimating difficulties, or balancing probabilities.

What then will be the consequences of the patriotic resistance of these two Northern Provinces to the French Usurper? The efforts of these brave men may, for a season, engage his attention, distract his force, and render his conquest less easy, and less secure. These are, no doubt, events of considerable importance, if we make use of the interval to increase, strengthen, and consolidate our own means of defence and annoyance, but fatally delusive if they are to encourage hopes that Spain is destined to form a barrier to the extended ambition of Bonaparte.

The truth is, our danger is at the present moment more imminent than it has been, at any period, since the commencement of the present war. This proposition has been very ably illustrated by Mr. York, in his excellent speech in the House of Commons, on Monday last, respecting the Defence of the Country. If, therefore, we do not speedily and effectually rouse from that lethargy, into which all ranks among us have unfortunately fallen; if we become not fully sensible of the peril of our situation; if we blindly trust to our naval superiority, and await with a lamentable inaction, and a presumptuous, a criminal, confidence, the coming storm; if we prepare not, with extraordinary exertions, to meet the surrounding dangers; and if we foolishly expect, or feel the smallest confidence in any foreign aid, the hazard is incalculable (and melancholy for a Briton to allow) our destruction not impossible.

Let us, therefore, be fully convinced of what is almost indubitably certain, that we may soon be exposed, alone, to the entire, the undivided, the concentrated strength of Europe. We are opposed to a man, who, though highly aided by Fortune, is still more highly gifted by Nature: who restlessly pursues his schemes: who has hitherto obtained the objects of his ambition: who hates us, our power, our liberty, and our independance, with an unextinguishable hatred; whose interest, whose Power whose happiness depends, in a considerable degree, on our destruction.

This man now wields the sceptre of Europe.—He has subdued the Netherlands, Holland, and all the States of Italy: he has conquered Prussia, defeated and terrified Austria, humbled Russia, conciliated Denmark, acquired the confidence and friendship of the Porte, seized upon Portugal, and has now taken possession of Spain. Let us consider, for a moment, the means which he possesses of invading our shores. He has all the wealth of the Continent at his command. A million of soldiers, brave and adventurous, accustomed to warfare and victory, are assembled under his banners. All the Continental Ports which are open to the Atlantic and German oceans, from Cadiz to the Texel, are now under his controul—in his possession. Will any man who loves his country, after a consideration of these circumstances, venture to assert, that this enemy is not awfully formidable? Can any exertion be too strenuous, can any anxiety be too great respecting the contest with such a foe.

The great natural advantage of our insular situation, and the proud superiority of our navy, have hitherto been considered, by the bulk of the nation, as fences against invasion, nearly impossible to be surmounted. Under common times and circumstances, and against a common enemy, it might have been reasonable to think so, but opposed as we now are, to a combination of physical means, with superlative ability, almost unprecedented in the history of mankind, it is prudent to set some bounds to our confidence. Our most able admirals have all declared, that an invasion was by no means unlikely or impracticable. Lord Nelson, Lord St. Vincent, Lord Howe, Sir Sidney Smith, have all said so. And if this be true, of which there can be no doubt, we ought, undoubtedly, to be as much prepared to meet the French, as if we had not a single ship at sea.

For this purpose, some more comprehensive measures than any yet adopted, should be immediately resorted to. Our regular army, though excellent, is scarcely sufficient in number to guard the whole extent of our coasts. The noble, the laudable, the honourable spirit, which originally animated our volunteers, has, owing to various causes, which we shall not now stop to enumerate, almost totally evaporated. Our army of reserve has decayed; the recruiting system is less productive than formerly; and the local militia plan is dreadfully inferior to the magnitude of our danger. A plan similar to that recently proposed by Lord Selkirk, is strenuously called for by the present alarming crisis—is absolutely necessary for the preservation of our national existence. Let every young man in the country able to carry arms, be instructed in the most essential part of the tactics of modern warfare. Let the people be made duly sensible of the extent of their danger, and the necessity of their exertions. Let the only strife among our great men be, who shall most benefit, and advance the interests of the country. Let all ranks enthusiastically and permanently unite in preparing to repel the approaching enemy. In this way, and in this way alone, can the safety of the country be really secured.

And if we be prudent enough to do so, we shall be under no necessity of looking with eagerness and anxiety to the brave, honourable, but fruitless, exertions of the Patriots of Spain; we shall be fully able to defend ourselves against the whole world; we may contemn the threats and attack of the Master of the Continent; and transmit a glorious lesson to posterity of the brave and successful resistance of a free people, to the greatest, the most formidable tyrant, that the world ever saw; and may hand down to future generations, our liberties, our equal laws, our attainments in science, our acquirements in knowledge and civilization, and every thing that is valuable and interesting to society.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL PAMPHLETEERS.

No. XXVI.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK'S PAMPHLET ON THE NECESSITY OF A MORE EFFECTUAL SYSTEM OF NATIONAL DEFENCE, AND THE MEANS OF ESTABLISHING THE PERMANENT SECURITY OF THE KINGDOM.

(Concluded from our last.)

On the third section of Lord Selkirk's Pamphlet, the section in which he demonstrates the advantages that his proposed institution would be likely to produce for the security of the kingdom, it is unnecessary for us to make any observations. His Lordship's reasonings there are all upon the military operations best calculated for the case of an invasion, and admirably do these reasonings seem fitted to provide against the dangers that are to be dreaded from such an event.

In the fourth section, in which he enters upon a comparison of his own plan of Local Militia, with the Volunteer System, and with the scheme proposed for a general array, his arguments are, for the most part, equally satisfactory. We will say a few words upon the question of this comparison, and first of the Volunteer System.

The Volunteer System has the advantage of being already established; but of what value is the temporary establishment of that, which in its own nature admits of no establishment that can be durable? The privilege that every individual possesses, of quitting his corps at pleasure, is an insuperable obstacle not only to the acquisition of military habits, but to the permanency of the system itself. For though the sudden danger of the country, or the fear of a general array, or some other partial or temporary cause, may for one year swell the Volunteer force to a power amply sufficient for every purpose of defence, yet at each man is at liberty to quit his corps whenever he pleases, is is to be expected that the vigour and fullness of the system will cease, when the stimulus ceases that urged that system. Besides, we fear that permanent duty, with all its mischiefs, is an evil absolutely necessary; and the Volunteer Plan of drill-days, and half drill-days, can never be of any real practical benefit. The Volunteers, too, are indiscriminately men of all ages, and a great proportion of them are persons in the higher ranks of life, so that to put them upon permanent duty would occasion every, very heavy inconvenience to business of every kind: whereas young men, and men in the lower classes of life, occasion no such serious mischiefs, by being absent for a few weeks from their regular occupations.

Lord Selkirk very justly apprehends, that some persons may object to the dissolution of the Volunteer System, lest it should offend the numerous body of the Volunteers. But he conceives this objection unfounded; because, says he,

"There may be individuals who have entered among the Volunteers for the mere purpose of obtaining exemption from "ballots, or similar privileges, and who may be reluctant to "lose these advantages. But the great body of the Volunteers, "the men who, four or five years ago, came forward with so "much zeal at the call of their country, can have no wish to "continue their laborious exertions any longer than they are "necessary. From patriotic motives they undertook a severe "task, in a season of great public alarm: and from feelings of "honour they have thought themselves bound not to withdraw, "while Government continued to demand their services. But "the performance is a personal burden, from which it is most "natural that they should wish, and most proper that they "ought to be relieved. When they see every purpose of their "institution answered in a permanent and effectual manner, can "they have any reluctance in yielding to their successors, the "burdensome post which they have so long and honourably "maintained?"

We are afraid that his Lordship's opinion of the motives that induced the Volunteers to enrol themselves, is of a nature too much exalted. If, however, the liable age were from eighteen to twenty-one, as we proposed in our last Number, instead of being from eighteen to twenty-five, the number of Volunteers liable to the new enrolment, would be so small, that this objection could no longer exist. An exemptim is proposed by his Lordship in favour of the Yeomanry Cavalry, who from their personal stake in the country, and their local knowledge, are in some respects preferable even to Regular Troops.

As to the plan of a general array, to include the whole male population of a mature age, its advantages are hardly sufficient to entitle it to a comparison with Lord Selkirk's scheme. Every body must see how much better the safety of the kingdom will be secured by a complete and effectual training, applied to an adequate body of men, than by extending an imperfect and superficial instruction over a greater number. Beside, it must never be forgotten, that upon Lord Selkirk's plan all the men in the kingdom will, in the course of another generation, have gone through a series of military discipline, at the period of life best suited for the reception of durable impressions. And the extension of a military instruction at once over all the men of all ages, would be attended with an enormous and absolutely unproductive expence. However, there is another kind of enrolment, comprising the whole population, which Lord Selkirk thinks might be advantageous, not for services strictly military, but for objects of a subsidiary nature: such as the obstruction of an enemy, by cutting up roads, breaking down bridges, destroying provender, constructing entrenchments, and other useful operations.

There is no reason, says he, to doubt, that our people would be ready voluntarily to render every service of this kind; but these spontaneous services will not be sufficiently prompt to be of real use. It must be ever borne in mind, that if the enemy land in England, a very short period must decide the contest in

No aid therefore f any value, that is not given with instantaneous rea- and that promptitude cannot possibly be expected previous arrangement and organization. It has been riously remarked that in the peculiar state of society evails in England, we have no class of men correspond- e peasantry of some of the less commercial countries on nent, men, who from the variety of their occupations, habits of life, are capable of acting as irregular troops ithout instruction, or direction. In the appointment of officers, it is ade that commands be given to persons of popular cha- d local influence. A chaplain of the established church ed for each regiment; but in case one-third of the me communion of dissenters, Lord Selkirk advises that tended by a clergyman of their own persuasion, at the of Government. He proposes also, that in the Roman districts a proportion of the officers always be of that n. In this plan for Ireland we do not see much to ad cept the provision for the appointment of officers and ; but the confused state of Ireland renders it necessary nething, and we think it probable that Lord Selkirk's be the most rational that circumstances will admi far it may fall short of the kind of equality which all men, and Lord Selkirk among them, desire to see es between the constitution of England and that of The present plan is little else than a militia, passing b ance, and provided with somewhat better regulations. rdship then enters upon an investigation of the merit litia that now subsists among us, and completely proves racy and inconvenience of such a body. He proves that a regiments are as expensive to the country as regular without being so useful. He proves that the expence inding the whole body of 400,000 men, which his plan j d to raise, is an expence no greater than that of the es- ent of about 50,000 men on the present system of militia, bvious that the 400,000 local militia-men must be worth n the 50,000 ordinary militia-men. He proves further ystem of militia-ballot, and the premiums that neces- end it, attract as substitutes many men who would other- r the line, and that thus the regular army is weakened e present ordination of affairs. HOLLAND.

ANSWER OF THE GOVERNOR OF CADIZ, TO ADMIRAL PURVIS, &c.

ROTTERDAM, JUNE 10.—The Moniteur of the 4th contains articles to the following effect:—

The troops forming the garrison of Sweaborg, who have been made prisoners of war by the Russians, amount to 8000 men, and in the several actions in Finland the Swedes have had about 4000 killed and made prisoners. Thus the loss of the Swedes may be altogether estimated at 12,000 men. They will receive from England no aid corresponding to this loss. Where are the armies and fleets of England, while Sweden is thus suffering for her sake—they are before Cadiz. Allured by the state of affairs in Spain, they have sent about 10,000 men to Gibraltar, and they have panned 4000 before the port of Cadiz.

A ship of 74 guns approached the harbour of Cadiz as a flag of truce, but she was received with cannon balls. At last, a boat came from her with a message, and she was sent back with the following answer by the Captain-General:

"We do not want your interference. If we have any dispute "with the French, that is nothing to you. Whatever differ- "ences may be between us are only family affairs; you wish to "destroy the barracks, and to capture the Spanish and French "fleets; that would indeed be a fine catch for you, and you "would doubtless be grievously offended if you thought that we "were not ready for you—we have 15,000 men in the camp of "St. Roche, and an equal number here. General Solano is on "his way to us with his division, and the French General Du- "pont enters Seville with 30,000 men.

Meanwhile the English are always intriguing with the Moors; but the Emperor has demanded a positive answer from the King of Morocco, and that Prince will not be imprudent enough to draw upon himself the united enmity of France and Spain. He will long regret the first gun he fires against Ceuta.

NAVAL PROJECTS OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.

On the 24th May, the Prince Arch-Chancellor, presiding in the Sitting of the Senate, appointed the State-Counsellor, Regnault de St. Jean d'Angely, Minister of State, to lay before them the grounds of a Senatus Consultum, for uniting Tuscany with the French Empire; and M. Semonville spoke in the name of the Commission of the Senate, which unanimously voted for this incorporation. The following is a summary of the assigned grounds:—

"The whole coast of the Mediterranean Sea must form a part of the French territory of the great Empire. The regions, the coasts adjoining to the Adriatic, are united with the kingdom of Italy; all those which lie along the Mediterranean, which are adjacent to our territory, must be united with the empire of France. From Leghorn to Toulon, to Genoa, to the department of Corsica, is not farther than from Leghorn to Milan. The commerce of the Mediterranean, whatever may be the opposition of the Tyrant of the Seas, shall be necessarily under the influence of France. The very same first principles, in consequence of which Genoa was incorporated with France rather than with the kingdom of Italy, also require that Leghorn be made a part of that empire. The kingdom of Naples, which lies both on the Mediterranean and the Adriatic, constitutes a distinct kingdom, subject, however, to the same federative system, and to the same state policy.

"The port of Leghorn has given constant reasons of complaint to France. That port, appertaining to a territory, governed by a weak Prince, had fallen under the influence of England, and was become one of the principal inlets for her commerce. In different instances, without wishing to violate the neutrality of the Sovereign of Tuscany, it became necessary for divisions of French troops to enter Leghorn, to confiscate the English merchandize there. These violations of territory, however necessary, are always disagreeable; and since Leghorn cannot be under the influence of France and England at the same time, it must become a part of France. Besides, Leghorn and the Tuscan territory produces sailors for the extension of our marine; through its whole extent ship-building is carried on, and in the same proportion must the means be increased of providing seamen for manning them. If, as of late, a squadron was created at Toulon, as if by a miracle; and if, contrary to the ideas of all those who are acquainted with the sea service, we found means to equip a numerous squadron, which Admiral Ganteaume commanded with so much ability, and for which he obtained so much renown, by the skilful manœuvres by which he frustrated the plans of the enemy—which having supplied with men, provisions, and warlike stores, Corfu, the key of the Adriatic, menaced by an expedition already on its way, thus rendered fruitless, and which, on its returning voyage, capturing many considerable prizes, braved all storms, and exercised the crews during a difficult voyage of three months—if all these advantages have been gained, they must be partly ascribed to the incorporation of Genoa, which numbers many of her sons among the good seamen of that squadron.

"The Sons of the Arno are invited to the glory, his Majesty having decreed that Spezzia shall be a military port; the docks, the works of the arsenal, and the forts, both on the sea and land side, are already marked out, and before the end of the present year, six ships of two or three decks shall be put upon the stocks.

"It would not be proper to establish such considerable works at the extremities of the empire, if a foreign power were placed at the very gates of that arsenal. Spezzia shall become a second Toulon in the Mediterranean; on the whole coast there abound iron, timber, provisions, and useful hands: the provisions, the iron, and the men surrendered up, must become French. France and the continent, which are desirous of restoring the balance of power on the ocean, have the self-same interest in the prosperity of the new maritime department of Spezzia. The incorporation of Tuscany is a necessary consequence of that grand plan.

"This union is also the interest of Tuscany, which, under the sway of its little princes, was governed without system, without vigour, and was perpetually infested by the Barbary powers. Men can now no longer be governed in a capricious and fantastic manner. There must be a certain rule, the Government of the law, protected by a Prince sufficiently great and elevated above the passions of men, and inflexible, as the law is necessary for this purpose. The time indeed is passed, in which it was believed that people were made for kings, not kings for people. Lands, pastures, and forests may become property, but no person can possess a kingdom as if it were a farm. These disastrous consequences can no longer take place in great states. It is in vain then that objections are made to the great extension of the empire; the communication by land, now that neither Alps or Appenines oppose it, is as easy from Leghorn to Paris, as from Paris to Nice. It has been the policy of European states to subdue the most distant countries, in order to obtain new commercial and maritime resources: why then should we neglect those resources and acquisitions which are so valuable to us? The territory of the Medicis, the country of the sciences and the arts, must form an immediate part of the French empire.

"The dukedom of Urbino, Camerino, and the mark of Ancona, lying on the coast of the Adriatic, fall under the influence of Venice, and must necessarily be united with the kingdom of Italy. This is also accomplished, and the considerable works in the port of Ancona will afford the opportunity of fitting out there ten sail of the line, to secure the freedom of the Adriatic sea, of which Ancona shall be the harbour, and Venice the naval arsenal. Before the end of this year five sail of the line shall be lying in the roads of Ancona, in that dangerous sea, which to the English presents only hostile shores, and where they will be obliged to maintain six ships of the line, if they attempt to counter-balance our power. No, the war shall not be eternal, in spite of the blind fury which cherishes that inhuman and senseless principle in the cabinet of London. Every where French squadrons are forming, and our naval power in the Scheldt is already considerable. In a few days there will be in the roads of Flushing and Antwerp a fleet of 30 sail of the line; that on the coast of Brittany will be still stronger. Besides that, we have the allied Russian squadron at Lisbon, where there are already a division of several new ships of the line in the best state, which the rapid advance of the army under General Junot placed in our hands.

"The events in Spain have converted a declining and badly conducted monarchy into a constitutional and energetic government; the dock-yards at Cadiz, Ferrol, and Carthagena have felt this already. Toulon, Spezzia, Venice, all the resources forthcoming from Holland, Spain, and Italy, are in operation; we must have ships, and these last named countries have no deficiency either of iron or of timber and hemp, for building or rigging them.

"A decree has been issued from the Emperor for the incorporation of Tuscany, on the principle of the necessity for completing the system of the great empire, and for rendering the naval administration of France harmonious throughout all the members of the great confederacy. Without the incorporation of Tuscany, there could be no immediate communication with Naples, and our relations could not be maintained with her, but through the medium of states subsisting under other governments, from which it might be feared that the guidance and influence might be lost, which must be exercised towards such states, to place the coasts and sailors in a state of opposition to the common enemy."

The following is the Decree of the Senate, passed in consequence of this exposition:

Art. 1. The Dukedoms of Parma and Placentia are united to the French Empire under the name of the Department of the Taro; they shall form an inseparable indivisible portion of the French territory, from the period of the notification of the present Senatus Consultum.

2. The States of Tuscany are united to the French Empire, under the name of the Department of the Arno, the Department of the Mediterranean, and the Department of the Ombrona. They shall form an indivisible portion of the French Empire, from the period of the notification of the present Decree.

3. The laws which govern the French Empire shall, in the Departments of the Arno, the Mediterranean, and the Ombrona, be made public before the 1st of January, 1809, the period from which the Constitutional Government for these Departments shall take its commencement.

4. The Department of the Taro, and that of the Arno, shall each have six Deputies in the Legislative body, the Department of the Mediterranean three, and the Department of the Ombrona three; which will raise the number of the Members of that Body to 342.

5. The Deputies of the Department of the Taro shall be chosen and named without delay, and shall enter the Legislative Body before the Sitting of 1808.

6. The Deputies of the Departments of the Arno, of the Mediterranean, and of the Ambrona, shall enter the Legislative Body before the Session of 1809, &c.

SPAIN.

MADRID, MAY 24.—His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke of Berg, as well as the Junta of the Government, having been informed respecting the desire of the Emperor of the French to see assembled at Bayonne, on the 15th of June next, a deputation of 150 persons, from the Clergy, Nobility, and States-General, for the purpose of deliberating upon the interesting situation of that kingdom, the Junta is charged to take measures for expediting the execution of his Majesty's pleasure, and to give to the Cities and Corporations the necessary directions in these respects. The Clergy shall be represented by two Archbishops, six Bishops, named by the Junta, sixteen canons or dignitaries named by their chapters, twenty priests named by their Bishops, and six Generals of Orders. There shall be ten Grandees of Spain, namely, the Duke de Frias, the Duke de Medina Celi, the Duke de Hyen, the Count de Orgaz, the Count de Fuentes, the Marquis de Santa Cruz, the Count de Fernan Nunnez, the Duke d'Ossuna, the Duke del Parque, the Condt de Santa Colonna, 10 Titulars, and 10 Knights of Castille, two Deputies from Navarre, &c.

JUNE 3.—This day was published, in the name of his Majesty the Emperor of France, &c. a Proclamation to the Spanish nation. The following is a translation of the more important passages:—

"Spaniards! after a long lingering disease, your nation sunk into decay. I have seen your sufferings; I will relieve them. Your greatness makes a part of mine.

"Your Princes have ceded to me all their rights to the Spanish Crown. I will not reign over your provinces, but I will acquire an eternal right to the love and gratitude of your posterity.

"Your monarchy is old; it must be renovated, that you may enjoy the blessings of a renovation which shall not be purchased by civil war or desolation.

"Spaniards! I have convened a general assembly of the deputies of your provinces and towns, that I may know your desires and wants.

"I shall lay down my rights, and place your illustrious Crown upon the head of one who resembles me; securing you a Constitution, which will unite the salutary power of the Sovereign with the liberties and rights of the Spanish nation. It is my wish that my memory shall be blessed by your latest posterity, and that they shall say—he was the restorer of our country.

"Given at Bayonne, 25th May, 1808."

"By virtue of a mandate of his Imperial and Royal Highness the Grand Duke of Berg, dated the 22d inst. the existing Commission of Consolidation of the royal Vales is abolished. The Commission is in future to be composed of the President of Government, of the Supreme Council of Castile, two Ministers of the same Council, a Minister of the Council of the Indies, one of the Council of the Factory, and a Secretary. The Duke intrusted to this Commission are to secularise and sell, as far as is requisite, the Church lands, and to dispatch all other pressing business.

"His Imperial Highness has nominated Colonel Cabarrus to be Intendant-General in Chief of the Consolidation of the Royal Vales, with the title of Master of the Accounts, and the functions of Minister of the Commission of the Government.

BAYONNE, JUNE 4.—The day before yesterday his Majesty received, at his Levee, the Deputation of the Grandees of Spain, and had a very long conference with them. Among the Members who constitute this Deputation are mentioned Prince Castel Franco, the Duke del Parque, the Duke of Ossuna, the Marquis of Santa Cruz, and the Count of Santa Colonna. Yesterday his Excellency M. d'Auzanza, Minister of Finance, presented to his Majesty the Deputation of the Council of the Indies, and of the Council of Finance. His Majesty conversed two hours with the Members of this Deputation, concerning the changes and improvements which the welfare of Spain requires, in the opinion of all intelligent persons. The Deputies of the Extraordinary Junta are daily arriving.

The following Imperial Decree has been issued at Madrid:

"Napoleon, Emperor of the French, King of Italy, Protector of the Confederacy of the Rhine, &c.

"The King and the Princes of the House of Spain having ceded their rights to the Crown, as is known by their treaties of the 5th and 10th of May, and by their proclamations published by the Junta and the Council of Castile, we have decreed, and do decree, ordered, and do order, as follows:—

"Art. 1. The Assembly of the Notables, which has already been convened by the Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom, shall be held on the 15th of June, at Bayonne. The Deputies shall be charged with the sentiments, desires, and complaints of those they represent; and also with full power to fix the basis of the new Government for the Kingdom.

"2. Our cousin, the Grand Duke of Berg, shall continue to fulfil the functions of Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom.

"3. The Ministers, the Council of State, the Council of Castile, and all civil, ecclesiastical, and military authorities are, as far as is requisite, confirmed. Justice shall be administered under the same forms, and in the same manner as is usual.

"4. The Council of Castile is charged with the publication of this Decree, and with the affixing it on all places where it may be necessary, that no one may pretend ignorance of the same.

"Given in our Imperial and Royal Palace at Bayonne, the 25th of May, 1808. (Signed) "NAPOLEON."

ITALY.

NAPLES, JUNE 4.—The English, desirous to interrupt again the repose which we this moment enjoy, have disembarked some hundreds of banditti at various points of Calabria; but the people, who have been so often the victims of English instigations, and are convinced of their impotence, united in a mass to drive back these their allies.

ROME, MAY 21.—In the Courant of this city, there is the following important decree:

"Napoleon, by the grace of God, and by the Constitution, Emperor of the French, King of Italy, Protector of the Rhenish Confederacy, considering that the present Sovereign of Rome has constantly refused to declare war against the English, and to co-operate with the kingdoms of Italy and Naples for the protection of the Italian peninsula; that the interest of the two kingdoms, and the relative situation of Italy and Naples, require that their communication should be interrupted by no hostile Power; that the gift of the lands which compose the Ecclesiastical States was made by our illustrious predecessor Charlemagne, for the benefit of Christendom, but not for the succour of the enemies of our Holy Religion; therefore have re, upon consideration of the demand for passports, made by the Russian Ambassador at our Court, on the 8th of March, decreed, and do decree, as follows: [Here follow the different articles of this Decree, uniting the provinces of the Papal Territory to the kingdom of Italy, and presenting various local regulations as to their Government.] In pursuance of a second Decree, all Cardinals, Prelates, and other Officers of the Roman Court, born in the kingdom of Italy, must retire to the place of their birth before the 5th of June, on pain of forfeiting their places. At Ancona, on the 11th of May, the Papal Troops were already dismissed.

RUSSIA.

PETERSBURGH, MAY 18.—The execution of the long projected expedition to India is now spoken of with the greatest confidence. The corps of Davoust, it is said, will immediately be assembled at Astracan, where a Russian army is to join it. An army is prepared to co-operate with these in Persia, and to advance with them against the British settlements in India.

DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN, MAY 28.—Three thousand men of the light infantry of the Prince of Ponte Corvo are arrived in Zealand. They passed the Great Belt, and have disappointed the vigilance of the enemy's cruizers. In the neighbourhood of Rensburg, an encampment has been prepared for 10,000 men, which troops must be all assembled there in the beginning of July. A similar encampment for 8000 men will be prepared at Flensburg.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, JUNE 20.

A Message from the House of Commons brought up the Cape of Good Hope Trade Regulation Bill, and several private Bills, which were laid on the table.

COALS.

EARL MOIRA rose on the order of the day for the third reading on the Paddington Canal Coal Bill, and objected to it, on the ground, that an inland coal trade was detrimental to the Sea Coal Trade between London and Newcastle.

THE EARL OF SUFFOLK said it had been proved, that Newcastle, Shields, and Sunderland were not capable of supplying the metropolis at all time with coals. When the wind was adverse, the coal vessels could not get up to the Pool, and the consequence was, that the price of the article was increased to an enormous amount. He thought the Bill likely to save the Public expence in this useful article, and, under all the circumstances, gave the Bill his support. The Bill was then read a third time.

LOCAL MILITIA.

On the order of the day for receiving the Report of the Committee on the Local Militia Bill, EARL FITZWILLIAM moved an amendment, to exempt persons ballotted for the Local Militia from the operations of the Training Act. And after a few observations the amendment was put and negatived. The report was then received, and the Resolutions agreed to.

EARL STANHOPE rose, on the third reading of the Hare Shooting Bill, and observed, that the law, with reference to the appointment of gamekeepers, was better in the Act passed in the reign of George the First, than the law as it stood upon the subject in the present Bill. The question was put and negatived. The Bill was then read a third time.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 21.

A Messenger from the House of Commons brought up the Irish Local Militia Bill, the Stipendiary Curates Bill, and the British Herring Fishery Bill, which were read the first time.

LOCAL MILITIA BILL.

On the third reading of this Bill, THE EARL OF SELKIRK adverted to the notice he had given at a previous discussion of this measure, of his intention to propose an amendment relating to the balloting principle. He recommended, Government to call out a given number of young men annually, between the ages of eighteen and nineteen, to learn the use of arms. This plan, according to his opinion, would afford a more effectual force for the defence of the country than the mode of procuring men by ballot; and in order that the proposition might be adopted, he moved that the word "ballot" should be left out of the clause of the Bill. The motion was put and negatived.

Lord Radnor moved an amendment, to exempt persons balloted to serve in the Local Militia from the Training and other Military Acts of the Legislature. After a few observations from Lord Hawkesbury, the motion was put and negatived.—The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

MR. PALMER'S CLAIM.

LORD ELLIOT rose to make his motion, pursuant to notice, on the Bill for allowing compensation to Mr. Palmer, for his services in the Post-Office, department. He observed, that in addressing their Lordships, he was influenced by no other than a public motive. He then entered into a detail of the circumstances which induced Mr. Pitt to confer a grant of 3000*l.* per year on Mr. Palmer, and his subsequent dismissal from office. He then contended, that by not performing the duties of that office to which Mr. Palmer was appointed, he lost all claim to public compensation, and concluded by moving that the Bill be rejected.

Earl Moira entered into an eloquent argument in support of Mr. Palmer's claims, and contended, from the minutes of evidence laid before the House on the subject, that Mr. Palmer did not merit the obloquy and disgrace attributed to his conduct. It was not his intention to come to any decision respecting Mr. Palmer's claim, he merely opposed his motion for dismissing the Bill in defiance of the decision of the other House, and the attention which their Lordships were bound in justice to pay to the claim of a subject, who applied for public compensation. Under all the circumstances, he thought the present was not a proper opportunity for the House to come to any decision on the question of Mr. Palmer's claims; and he concluded by moving, "That the House do now adjourn."

The Lord Chancellor opposed the motion for the adjournment, and entered at some length into the consideration of the Bill before the House. Entertaining, as he did, all due respect for the other House of Parliament, which had sent up this Bill, he yet saw no substantial reasons for adopting it, and remained precisely of the same opinion he had formerly adopted, that whatever were the merits of Mr. Palmer towards the public, yet these had been sufficiently rewarded by a pension of 3000*l.* a year, and that he had no well founded claim to the grant proposed in the present Bill.

The House divided, when there appeared for the amendment, non-contents 10, contents 34, majority 24. The original motion was then carried without a division.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22.

IRISH BANK BILL.

Lord Grenville previous to entering into the discussion, presented a Petition from certain Bankers, Merchants, and Traders of the City of Dublin, professing the Roman Catholic Religion, praying not be excluded from being chosen as Governors and Directors to the Bank of Ireland. He then said, that he was about to move for complying with the prayer of the Petition. Their Lordships were now going to prolong the Charter of the Bank of Ireland for a period of thirty years, without having any reformation as to the terms upon which this grant was to be made: it was necessary to state here, that the prolongation of the charter was of very great value to the Bank of Ireland, for which, in fact, they gave nothing to the public in return: they were, to be sure, to lend a million and a half, but at a higher rate than it could be procured in this country. The Bank had also engaged to rid the public of the expence of managing the public debt, which amounted to no more than 7,525*l.* per annum, with the enormous addition of 23*l.* 17s. for the last year. It was evident, therefore, there never was a bargain made so disadvantageous to the public; for if they had declared they would grant this monopoly to the best bidder, they might have received very considerable pecuniary advantages. His Lordship entered into a comparison between the nature of the Bank of England and the Bank of Ireland, in order to shew that the Government could not be injured, or at all affected, by the admission of Roman Catholics to be Governors and Directors of the latter; and concluded by moving, "That it be an instruction to the Committee to make distinct provision in the Bill, that the Roman Catholics of Ireland be admitted Governors and Directors of the Bank of Ireland."

Lord Hawkesbury strongly objected to the motion; and contended that the sense of Parliament had been already taken upon the subject, and that this Bill did not put the Catholics in a worse situation than they were before; it was no more than a continuance of those disabilities under which they before laboured, and was exactly similar to the law with respect to the Bank of England.

The question being called for, a division took place:—For the motion, 63; Against it, 101—Majority, 38. The Bill passed through the Committee without any amendments.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23.

The Pilots Bill, the Subdivision Clerks Bill, Land Tax Commissioners Bill, Expiring Laws Bill, and Stamp Duties Bill, were brought up from the Commons.

The following Bills received the Royal Assent by Commission: Post Horse Duty Bill, Malta Trade Bill, the Export and Import Duty Bill, the Irish Distillery Bill, the Auditors of Public Accounts Continuation Bill, the American Trade Regulation Bill, the Prize Regulation Bill, the Hare Shooting Bill, the Lunatic Paupers Bill, and the Ireland Coal Navigation Bill, besides others, making in all twenty-six Public and Private Bills. The Commissioners were, Lords Walsingham, Spencer, and the Lord Chancellor.

On the first reading of the Stamp Duties Bill, Lord Lauderdale moved, that the Bill should be printed.

Lord Hawkesbury objected to the motion.

The question was put, and a division took place. The numbers were, contents 16—non-contents 28—against printing the Bill 12.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 24.

Mr. Wharton and others brought up from the Commons the Irish Treasury Bill's Bill, the Coffee Customs Reduction Bill, the Coffee Excise Duty Reduction Bill, and five other bills.

The Court of Sessions Stock-Bill, the Scotch Local Militia Bill, and the Dublin Police Bill, passed through a Committee, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, JUNE 20.

A new writ was ordered for the Borough of Great Yarmouth, in the room of S. Lushington, Esq. who had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

Mr. Rose brought up the Woollen Manufacture Penalties Suspension Bill, which was read a first time.

The Report of the Madeira Postage Committee was read, and agreed to, and the resolutions ordered to be made part of the Brazil Postage Bill.

Mr. Williams Wynne rose to move an Address to the King, for the purpose of providing a Prison for the Confinement of Lunatics, charged with offences. He observed, that prisons on the common construction, were very unfit for their reception; and he should therefore propose that a particular prison should be erected for the purpose in the neighbourhood of London, where the best medical aid could be procured.

LOCAL MILITIA.

The Lord Advocate for Scotland moved the third reading of the Scotch Local Militia Bill.

Mr. Yorke denied that the British discipline was at all so severe as the French, unless it could be said, that the punishment of death was less severe than that of the lash. The regular army was brought to a pitch of perfection that was never thought of before, both in discipline and numbers. But he was of opinion that a regular army could never suffice for the defence of the realm in such circumstances as the present. Something, therefore, of the nature of a conscription he held to be absolutely necessary. There was no way to meet the wolf when he came but by an armed population. But as Bonaparte's moral character was mischievous both to his own as well as to other countries, as many of his qualities were, it was impossible to deny that he was a great warrior, of the same rank with Cæsar and Alexander. He would have the whole of Europe, it was probable, under his command. There was a French party in Ireland; and however much we might depend upon our navy, it was impossible that it could be a complete security against the landing of an enemy, especially with the facilities of building ships, which Bonaparte would have by the possession of all the continental ports. The French, he said, had adopted the Roman principle of making the best use of the forces of the conquered country. Not only the French but the whole of Europe, therefore, would be upon our backs. Besides, if they were successfully resisted, it would be nothing to them, except merely a missing of their object. We played our last stake, and if we lost, every thing was gone. He adverted to the necessity of providing means of supplies to our navy in case of invasion, and for this purpose it was requisite, that Portsmouth and the principal ports should be in a proper state of defence. The Coast of Kent was now in a much better state of defence than before; but as the North-East coast ought to be secured as well as the South-West. He observed that we ought particularly to secure the communication with Ireland, a point that in case of invasion must be of the greatest importance. Another important object was to secure the capital. The short distance of London from the coast on the East and South, rendered it peculiarly exposed to the enemy in case they landed. It would be of the worst consequences to the country if they should be taken, and therefore it was a great object to take care of it; but even if London should be taken, measures ought to be adopted to secure the heart of the country; the places about Worcester, Gloucester, Shrewsbury, and in the line of the Severn. This would be the only salvation of the country. He descanted upon the importance of fortresses in the interior of the country, from the misfortunes of the continental nations, owing to the neglect of this circumstance. Austria, Prussia, Russia, &c. after the loss of some battles, lost every thing owing to the complete [illegible] of the frontiers. We had an opportunity of securing ourselves in this respect which they had not. Ought we to neglect this to leave every thing to the chance of the first one or two tles? The expence was not to be considered compared with magnitude of the object. Fortresses might be said to be unourable to liberty; but we lived in peculiar times which rered extraordinary measures, and he thought that such forses would not be unfavourable to liberty; they would merecerve as rallying points to our own forces. He hoped the ation of affairs would excuse his bringing these points under consideration of the House.

Lord Castlereagh admitted, that nothing could be more erial, than the discussion of the defence of the country in the ent situation of affairs; but, at the same time, it was not proper to attend to what had been done, than to what ained to be done. A system of fortification, he stated, to dverse to the constitutional views of many Gentlemen, and gh this were not the case, the ordnance establishment, had the commencement of the present war been kept extremely , and it was not one which could be increased with very great idity. But if it was thought eligible to adopt this mode of nce, it would be highly desirable that there should be an erstanding between Parliament and the Executive Governt upon this subject, and if this system was adopted, that it ld be persevered in, and that it should not be begun by one inistration and dropped by another. The two great arseof Portsmouth and Plymouth were already in a respectable e of defence, and all along the coast from Portsmouth to the r Thames, a line of defence was completed, which rendered shores upon the whole greatly more secure than the opposite t of the enemy. From the river Thames northward throughthe Eastern district, though plans were prepared with the e view before the former Administration came into power, ing was done to carry them into execution by that Admiation; but it was now proposed that they should be comted as speedily as possible. With respect to Ireland, regurveys had been made for the purpose of establishing a re- system of fortification in that country, under the direction Lord Chatham, and he had no doubt that steps would be n under the superintendance of that distinguished person, to e the most vulnerable part of the Empire in a state of the st possible security. He had had a measure in view for the ce of Scotland, but he had been induced by the suggestions me persons possessed of more local information than he had at part of the Empire, to postpone it till the next Session Parliament.

Mr. Windham did not, neither could he be ever brought to rove of this measure. He contrasted it with some of those ted by the late Administration, and declared it to be the t calculated for the object it was intended, than any that d possibly be invented.

me amendments were then proposed, agreed to, and added e Bill, and it was then read a third time, and ordered to Lords.

THE STIPENDIARY CURATES BILL.

the question being put for the third reading of this Bill, Barham opposed it, as giving too great power to Bishops, nly with respect to the immediate matters which appertain e clerical function, but as it would enable them with much effect to interfere in legislative elections.

Mr. Hawkins Brown denied that such interference was ever n in modern days to prevail. He admitted that a Bishop Winchester, in the early part of the reign of Queen Anne, interfered improperly, but it was very improbable that the would occur again.

e House divided, Ayes 18—Noes 20—Majority 53.

the motion that this Bill do pass, another division on a , proposed by Lord Porchester, took place—Ayes 7—s 61.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 21.

he Warehousing Goods Bill, the Paymasters Bill, and the ery Bill, were read a third time and passed.

r. W. Scott obtained leave to bring in a Bill for extending provisions of an Act of the 45th of the King, holding out an ragement to Seamen to enter into the Navy, which was s first time.

he Lottery Bill was read a third time.

the clause for preventing Appeals from interlocutory ments, in the Scotch Judicature Bill, Sir S. Romilly proed an amendment, that Appeals should not be allowed, exin cases where three of the Judges differed in opinion from majority. This amendment was agreed to.

Message from the Lords acquainted the House that their ships had agreed to the Barrack Master, the Paymasters, the Paddington Canal, and to several other public and private Bills.

ASSESSED TAXES.

The House proceeded to a Committee on the Bill for the better regulating the payment and collection of the Assessed Taxes.

Mr. Wardell moved, as an amendment to the ninth clause, "that the inspector should be obliged to specify the nature and "object of the surcharge." After some conversation this was withdrawn, and, on the suggestion of the Solicitor General, a clause to the same effect, but more precise in wording, was adopted.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to insert an amendment in the Bill, reducing the fine of 500*l.* imposed on assessors making an unfounded surcharge, to 100*l.* on the ground that the former sum was excessive, and calculated to discourage proper persons from undertaking the office.

Mr. Smith, Mr. Spencer Stanhope, and others argued in favour of the original sum. The House divided, and there appeared for the amendment 63, against it 21, majority 42.

Another clause was proposed by Mr. Perceval, for the appointment of Commissioners-General and Inspectors-General, to determine causes of appeal, and to be allowed salaries of 600*l.* a year each, exclusive of incidental expences to be incurred for clerks, travelling, &c.

Mr. Tierney and Mr. Whitbread opposed it on the grounds that the offices were wholly unnecessary, and would considerably burthen the finances of the country. The House divided, and there were, for the clause 58, against it 15, majority 43.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22.

COPY-RIGHT.

Mr. Wynne urged the justice and propriety of postponing this Bill till another Session, and argued at length against the Bill, on several distinct grounds. He denied that it would, in fact, be an encouragement of Authors, by augmenting the price of their labours, in consideration that their Copy-right was to extend to a second period of fourteen years; and the obligation to deliver gratis to the Universities and public Libraries, eleven copies of their publication, he considered as oppressive both to authors and booksellers. In fact, the very men whom this Bill proposed to encourage, would be the persons most injured by its operation; namely, the authors and publishers of great literary works, who would be obliged to pay largely for a very remote advantage; while the publishers of fugitive and temporary publications would derive no benefit whatever from the enlarged Copy-right; yet they must submit to a loss of eleven copies, which copies would, nevertheless, be of no use to the Universities or public Libraries. The Hon. and Learned Member urged a variety of other arguments against the Bill, and said it was not called for by any complaint of the Universities or Public Libraries; and that there was a petition now ready, signed by a number of the most eminent Booksellers in London against the Bill, which he would have been prepared to present to the House, but that he was not aware of the subject coming forward for discussion so early in the day.

Sir Vicary Gibbs thought it would obviate some of the principal objections against the Bill to move for its recommitral, with an instruction to the Committee to divide it into two parts, the first of which, relating to the claims of the Universities and Public Libraries to the delivery of copies of such publications, might be passed this Session; and the other, which related to the extension of Copy-right to authors, to stand over for further deliberation. He observed, the author or publisher had no right to complain of the condition imposed by the Act of Queen Anne, for delivering a Copy of each work to the Universities and Public Libraries, as it was the very ground upon which they enjoyed the exclusive protection of Copy-right in such works for fourteen years. The right of claim under Queen Anne's Act, on the part of the Public Libraries, was never once questioned until it was discovered, that by a mere lapse in the wording of the Statute the claim could not be longer enforced.

Mr. Wynne read a list of the principal Booksellers who signed a Petition against the Bill, and he concluded by moving that further proceedings on it be postponed to this day three months.

Sir S. Romilly thought the part of the Bill now proposed to be passed, was that which ought to be deferred, as involving more material and complicated interests, and requiring more mature deliberation. He thought it a case of great severity upon the publishers of expensive works; such, for instance, as Boydell's Shakespeare, and other splendid publications, print-in the most costly style, and decorated with the most masterly and expensive plates by the first artists, to be obliged to present to the Universities and certain Public Libraries, eleven copies of such works, to the value of 550 guineas, and this, too, under the idea of protection for Copy-right, to him not worth a farthing: for it was on the expensiveness of the edition that the security of Copy-right depended against any rival publication, much more than in the law of Queen Anne. He thought, therefore, that where a publisher did not claim any protection of Copy-right, he ought not to be obliged to make such a sacrifice, and that a provision to that effect should be made in the Bill.

Sir Vicary Gibbs agreed to the principle recommended by Sir Samuel Romilly, of exempting any author or publisher from claims for copies, who did not require protection for Copyright. Sir Vicary Gibbs was proceeding, when the Speaker suggested to the Committee the propriety of adjourning for a short time, as a message from the Lords was in waiting: the messengers were accordingly called in, and the Lords' Assent was declared to the following Bills; the Malt Duty Bill, the Spirits Drawback Bill, the Land Tax Bill, the Prize Goods Bill, the Pilots' Bill, and the Local Militia Bill.

The Spirit Regulation Bill was read a third time and passed; as were also the Irish Treasury and Welch Coal Bills.

Sir Samuel Romilly said, it was not his intention to pursue the Acquitted Felons' Compensation Bill any farther this session.

COMMITTEE ON THE COPY-RIGHT BILL.

The Attorney-General moved, that the providing Public Libraries with Copies of Books should, under certain circumstances, be dispensed with.

The Clause for securing the Copy-right for twenty-eight years was put, and agreed to.

A long discussion took place with respect to what copies of books should be sent to the Universities; whether it should be on the best paper, or on common paper.

The Attorney General afterwards proposed a Clause, that it should be such paper as the impression for general use, which was finally agreed to.

PROTECTION OF THE OYSTER FISHERIES.

The Report of the Bill for the better protection of the Oyster Fisheries was then brought up.

Sir S. Romilly opposed the principle of the Bill, which appeared to him to impose a penalty which, in many cases, would be too severe. He disapproved of the punishment of transportation for seven years, which was found to deprave entirely the morals of those who suffered it.

The Solicitor General argued that it was a felony at common law; and that it was only an Act which had been passed for giving greater protection to the Oyster Fishery, that by an inadvertence in the wording of it prevented this offence from being a felony. The present Bill went only to restore the common law in this respect. The punishment was nothing different from that which larceny is subject to.

The Report was agreed to.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23.

The Privately Stealing Bill was read a third time and passed. The Danish Prize-ship Sale Bill was read a third time and passed. Read a third time the Woolwich Water Works Bill, and the Annuity Bill, as was the Brazil Postage Bill.

The Coffee Customs Bill, after a few observations from Mr. Hibbert, and a reply from Mr. Huskisson, was read a third time, and ordered to the Lords.

The Coffee Exportation Bill was read a third time, and ordered to the Lords.

ARMY CLOTHING.

Mr. Wardell called the attention of the House to the subject of the Clothing of the Army. The immediate object that he should submit for consideration was matters of contracts. The Lords of the Treasury had published an order, that the army should be clothed by public contract, notwithstanding which he found that private contracts, through private interests, prevailed, and the order was not only disobeyed, but disregarded. In short, the Commander in Chief, through the medium of the Secretary at War, assumed to himself the right of contract, and by the letters and correspondence on the table it appeared, that in the year 1803 contracts were made for great coats at the rate of 16s. 6d. per coat, when kersey was 4s. 6d. per yard, and that the same sum was given for the same article up to February 1806, when kersey was but 3s. 6d. per yard. The Hon. Member stated the advantages that had the preference upon these occasions of Messrs. Taylor and Co. in the case of a Mr. Pearce. That by these [illegible] the public lost a very considerable sum annually, which, considering the fall of the kersey, and the reduction in the price of wages, could not be computed, taking the army 250,000 men, at less than 90001. per annum in great coats alone. He instanced a case, where the said Mr. Pearse, having privately got a contract for making 25,000 of these kersey great coats, at the rate of 16s. 6d. per coat, immediately went to Mr. Dixon, a common slop-seller in Fenchurch-street, and actually bargained with him to make them at from 13s. 6d. to 14s. a-coat, which he accordingly did: and Mr. Pearse, for having merely the trouble of walking from his own house to the Horse Guards, and thence to Fenchurch-street, put upwards of 3,5001. into his pocket. The Hon. Gentlemen proceeded; he observed that Messrs. Scott and Co. of St. Martin's-lane, had offered their services to the Treasury to contract for clothing, and to provide great coats for the army; yet, although the Treasury again made efforts to have these bargains effected by public contracts, and fair competition, they could not succeed. Messrs. Scott were constrained to have recourse to private influence, and they lately, through that medium, got a contract privately for making 25,000, at 14s. each, when, had they been allowed to send in, under fair competition, their proposals, they would have made the same coats for 12s. each. Upon the whole, he calculated that a saving might be made of 101,0001.; and if the saving on soldiers caps, and the other fantastic articles in which we saw some of our military dressed, were added, the amount of the savings would be nearer 200,0001. The Hon. Gentleman then moved three Resolutions, the purport of which was, that a great deal of unnecessary expence had been incurred in the army clothing; that it should be conducted by open contract; and that a Committee be appointed for the purpose of making the necessary inquiries into the subject.

The Secretary at War said, as to the complaint, that after the contract for great coats in 1803, which specified, that if the cloths fell the prices were to be reduced, he had been assured, that the prices of the kerseys had continued much the same up to the present period. This was the only reason why there had been no reduction of prices. As to the reference to the Commander in Chief it must be evidently of great importance, that whatever respected the clothing, and of course the comfort of the army, should be referred to so high an authority. The great coats for the soldiers were to last three years, and were essentially necessary to their comfort, particularly in cold climates; it therefore became a matter of great importance that these should be made of the best materials, and it was certainly proper that no new plan, by way of contract, should be introduced, by which the comforts of the soldier might be endangered. As to the army clothing in general, it was entirely the private business of the Colonel of every regiment to contract for the clothing of his regiment with whatever clothier he pleased. With this the Secretary at War had no connection, and had no interest whatever in the matter. The Treasury certainly delivered an opinion in favour of open contract; but still this opinion was open to the representations from the Secretary at War and Commander in Chief. The Treasury recommended a certain system to be adopted with regard to the great coats; this was referred to the Duke of York and the Board of General Officers, who made a strong representation on the subject. The recommendation of the Treasury was repeated, and a second remonstrance was delivered by the Board of General Officers, without effect. He believed, however, that a Report would speedily be presented from the Committee of Military Inquiry on this very subject, recommending a new system on the subject of army clothing, and this would render unnecessary the appointment of the new Committee proposed by the Hon. Gentleman. Upon the whole, however, he thought the public would be a loser if the clothing was taken out of the hands of the Colonels, for it was a mistake to suppose that any emoluments arose to them from it, though it was attended with a great deal of trouble; and he believed that in general they would wish to get rid of it. The Right Hon. Gentleman then concluded with moving the previous question on the several Resolutions.

Mr. Whitbread observed, that it was certainly highly proper, as had been stated by the Right Hon. Gentleman that the comfort of the soldier should be studied as much as possible. But certainly, from the new and fantastic dresses in which many of the cavalry regiments were clothed, it would seem as if his discomfort was rather studied, and to make him a subject of laughter and ridicule. Certainly this was a very natural conclusion, when we saw our cavalry loaded with these immense fur caps, and ruffs about their necks, with something dangling against their sides, all which absolutely overloaded them, without defending them from either rain, sun, or cold. He would ask the Hon. Secretary at War, was it extremely comfortable to make them wear whiskers, and that at a time when we were happy razor to our own native regiments in India, contrary to abits and prejudices? His Hon. Friend had maintained higher price was paid for the great coats of the army as necessary, and would it add any thing to their comfort gher price was paid, rather than a lower, provided the als were equally good? Was it not better for the country ey should have good great coats at 14s. than coats of the aterials at 16s. A public contract was evidently prefer- o one that was private, for the fair dealer would always advantage from competition.

Wardell shortly replied to what had been said, and consented to withdraw his Resolutions for the present.

MR. PALMER'S CLAIM.

Chancellor of the Exchequer stated his reasons oving that this grant be made in the form of a particular ostead of being founded on a mere resolution of the House. ming, among other grants, into the Appropriation Bill of ar. The Right Hon. Member reviewed at considerable a variety of precedents on the subjects, all going to shew he House had been in the practice of making resolutions grant of money to individuals either part of the general priation Act of the year, or the subject of distinct Bills. erred to five different conditional grants of money to in- als for discoveries which they had made, all of which mbodied in separate Bills. There were various grants also ey for public works, among which he instanced the grant building of Westminster Bridge, which did not appear Appropriation Act of the year, but which were passed form of separate Bills. From all these instances he col- as a general proposition, that these grants were passed in the Appropriation Act, or by separate Bills, and there appeared in all those cases any reason why the House n one way than the other. And therefore, with so many ents before them it was perfectly in the option of the to proceed either in the one way or in the other, either ting the grant o Mr. Palmer in the Appropriation Act of ar, or by bringing in a distinct Bill for that purpose, was the mode he had now to propose. He thought, that there was a case for making the grant in the shape of a Bill, it was the present; for he believed there never instance in which a prospective grant was put in the f a Bill, whilst a retrospective grant, founded on the ounds, appeared in the shape of a vote in the Committee ly. He should therefore move for leave to bring in a rsuant to the resolution of the 14th June last.

Palmer gave a brief detail of the proceedings that had lace respecting his father's claim. The appointment of mmittee—the Report—and the candid manner in which ancellor of the Exchequer had conducted himself in the s part of the proceedings. He did not mean to blame ht Hon. Gentleman now, but he certainly found himself wkward situation. Every step seemed to remove him from his object.—He was referring to what had passed House of Lords, when he was called to order by the r.

Windham commended the very proper conduct that had served by the Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Palmer) on le of this business. FRIDAY, JUNE 24.

Reprisal Bill, and the Cinque Ports Bill, was read a third nd ordered to the Lords.

ssenger from the Lords informed the House, that they reed to the Brazil Trade Bill, and the White Fishery Bill.

IMPORTANT INTERROGATORIES.

Mr. Wharton brought up the Report of the Appropriation Bill. On the question being put, that the amendments be read a first time,

Mr. Whitbread said he would, on the Report being brought up on the Vote of Credit Bill, put a few questions to the Right Hon. Secretary (Mr. Canning), and submitted to the courtesy of Ministers to give him an answer. The present, he observed, had been a very laborious Session, several Committees were appointed, and though he objected to the measure adopted in consequence of the Report of the Committee of West India Affairs, yet, as it was sanctioned by the vote of the House, he hoped it might be conducive to the relief that was expected. A Committee also sat on the affairs of the East India Company, and the country expected that the account between the Public and the Company was now finally closed. It was his intention early in the next Session, to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Lottery Committee, as it contained facts of a nature so heinous and disgraceful, that he was convinced his Majesty's Ministers could not contemplate them without producing a due impression. The Committee of Finance had also many laborious sittings, and it appeared from what the Chairman stated on a former night, that they were not likely to make any Report in the present Session. He could not say whether this disappointment to the Public arose from the construction of the Committee, that occasioned a collision among the Members, which rendered their labours useless to the Public or not, but he trusted that the mystery in which their differences was involved, would be disclosed early in the next Session. With respect to Ireland, a calm had ensued, after the irritations that prevailed in that country, notwithstanding the disappointment of the people in having the prayers of their Petition rejected. He hoped that calm was a presage to future tranquillity, which he trusted would have a due effect hereafter on the feelings of Parliament. He would ask the Right Hon. Gentleman whether or not the Orders in Council produced the beneficial effects on the enemy, with respect to the return of Peace, that were anticipated by Ministers, or whether they were not in a great measure done away by the licences granted by Government? These were questions, he knew, which depended on the courtesy of the Right Hon. Gentleman and his colleagues to answer, but he put them for the convenience of the House, though he might, if he thought fit, make a motion on each of them. The disposition to tumult which was manifested in the neighbourhood of Manchester, was a subject of regret, but he hoped that it would be attributed to the real cause, the distress of the manufacturers, and that they who were found offending would experience lenity, and not be treated as if they were actuated by any thing of a political nature, or had any reference whatever to party consideration. With respect to America, he was apprehensive that Ministers were not as successful as they expected, as the Congress was dissolved, and the embargo still continued. An expedition was sent out to the Baltic near two months since, which, according to the last accounts, still continued in a state of inactivity; another expedition had been sent out, and he hoped the result would be glorious, if the object was a good one. He wished also to know the cause of the arrival of Sir John Moore from Sicily, which, if he was rightly informed, was not expected by his Majesty's Ministers. He would also ask if Government had succeeded in its commercial relations with Sweden? He observed, that on the 29th of last April he proposed a resolution to the House, that it would not be disgraceful to propose to France a negociation for peace; he was still of the same opinion, and he hoped that during the recess Ministers would avail themselves of any opportunity that may occur to produce the blessings of tranquillity.

Mr. Secretary Canning observed, that the Hon. Member, on the Report being brought up of the Committee on the Appropriation Bill, had thought proper to put several questions to him, which it was his wish, as far as lay in his power, distinctly to answer, it was the wish of his Majesty's Ministers to co-operate with Sweden in the common cause, but the military plans and military councils of the King of Sweden had undergone some changes, and it was therefore necessary for Sir John Moore to send home for fresh instructions. The gallant General, it was true, left Sicily with a large force, which it was deemed necessary to have there, in consequence of the operations of the enemy; but he did not return to England without orders from the Government. As to the commercial co-operation of Sweden, the Orders in Council, and the Bill passed thereon, were sent out to the Court of Stockholm, with which it agreed, but it was also thought necessary to enter into an adjustment on the subject, which he had every reason to believe was by this time confirmed. With respect to America, it was the intention of his Majesty's Ministers to be conciliatory, without relinquishing any of our maritime rights, on which depended the honour, the glory, and the very existence of our navy.—(A cry of hear! hear!)—As to the disturbances at Manchester, he did not suppose the Hon. Member would carry his lenity to the extent of favouring those who availed themselves of the tumults to carry into effect their own designs, though they received no injury. The Orders in Council did not cause the irritation in America, which the Hon. Gentleman had insinuated, but it was the echo of the speeches made by those who disapproved of the Orders in Council, that had such effect. The present was certainly a laborious Session, and the Hon. Gentleman may derive some self-approbation from the circumstance, as he contributed to increase that labour.—With respect to any propositions for peace, his Majesty's Ministers entertained the same opinions which they expressed on a former occasion, but he did not imagine that recent occurrences rendered that desirable object more practicable than when the Hon. Gentleman made the motion to which he had alluded.

The amendments were agreed to, and the Bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The Assessed Taxes Bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. Huskisson brought in a Bill for paying Mr. Palmer a certain sum of money, being a per centage on the increased revenues of the General Post Office since that Gentleman communicated his plan, which had since proved so beneficial to the country. The Bill was then read a first time.

The Scots Judicature Bill was passed and ordered to the Lords.

The Woollen Suspension Bill was read a third time and passed, as was the Hop Bag Marking Bill, and also the Sugar Distillery Bill, together with the Irish Spirit Bill.

The Oyster Fishery Bill, on the motion of Mr. Dundas, was read a third time. Some verbal amendments were added, and the word "feloniously" was omitted; after which it was passed, and ordered to the Lords.

Massey's Divorce Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

DUBLIN, JUNE 18.—The Expedition from Cork, which is now nearly ascertained is to be under the command of Sir A. Wellesley, is preparing with the utmost activity. Two-and-twenty large transports for the conveyance of troops arrived at Cove on Monday last, as also those on board of which the 60th, or rifle regiment, are to be embarked, whose destination is North America. As dispatch seems to be the very soul of this enterprise, it is probable that it will be proceeded on almost immediately, particularly as the troops were pouring into Cork from the surrounding quarters, all the latter end of the last, and the beginning of the present week. The 5th Dragoon Guards are on their march for this City, to embark for England. The Veteran Battalions stationed at Cove Forts are under orders to to embark for Gibraltar.

To the Editor of The National Register.

SIR—From the experiments I have tried I find that the leaves of the vine, on being dried, which should be done in the shade, make an excellent and extremely wholesome tea, though somewhat different, both in taste and flavour, from that commonly used. I have also found that, besides being admirably calculated for making vinegar, the prunings of the vine, on being bruized and boiling water poured on them, in the same way as is done to malt, produce a liquor of a fine vinous quality; which being fermented, forms an excellent substitute for beer; and which, on being distilled, produces a very fine spirit of the nature of brandy. As this is the season for pruning the vine, many thousand cart loads of which are year after year thrown away as useless, where there are not goats to eat them; and the idea here suggested is not only new, but of high importance to the inhabitants of this country, particularly at the present juncture. Your inserting this in your highly useful and interesting Paper will oblige, Sir, your constant Reader, JAMES HALL.

We have seldom heard of a greater alteration in the value of land used for tillage, than has occurred in the parish of Old Monkland, in Lanarkshire. A farm, which sold in 1737 for between 200*l.* and 300*l.* and again in 1767, for 600*l.* now gives 1500*l.* annual rent.

A fish of an enormous size, called the "Basking Shark," was lately caught in Mount's Bay, Cornwall. It was full 30 feet long, and of great bulk. Its liver was estimated at a ton weight. A man might easily have crept down its throat. The of its jaw was so great, that the fisherman having boat-hook into its mouth to turn it, while struggling in snapped off the shaft of it, he said, as if it were a pi A female of the Basking Shark, but of less bulk, was few years ago on the coast of Dorsetshire.

A rather singular circumstance occured a few days South Shields:—A person wrote an anonymous letter Forsyth, of that place, informing him, that he (the writ about five years before, stolen a sheathing deal from his ship; and that, being converted by grace, he had stitution two-fold, by enclosing five shillings: which has sent to the treasurer of the Sunday schools.

MANCHESTER, JUNE 22.—I am extremely sorry that the refractory weavers have met again this da evinced a more turbulent disposition than at any perio dispute. POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

On Friday evening arrived a series of Dutch Papers to the 20th, and of Hamburgh and Altona Journals to the 1st. The accounts they furnish will be found highly interesting. BONAPARTE, with that coolness and decision which are produced by the perfect consciousness of power and ability, proceeds in his management of Spain with all the fact of the most impudent usurpation, and all the assumption of a superior Being who regards the distracted state of Kingdoms and Governments, with an eye of pity, and interferes only to correct the errors, and increase the power and happiness of the people. It will be seen by our extracts, that on the 15th instant a Deputation was to assemble at Bayonne, for the purpose of being made the instrument of his designs, and to carry his pleasure into formal execution. No man better understands, than NAPOLEON, the art of imposing, by the appearance of deliberative solemnity, nor has more skill in chusing actors for this species of mock heroic. It is with a melancholy feeling we observe some of the most distinguished Clergy and Nobles in Spain named as Deputies for their respective bodies, as it affords another very forcible proof of the weakness of the patriotic party.

It appears from what is stated in the Dutch Papers, that The Moniteur has published an account of the answer given by the Governor of Cadiz to Admiral PURVIS, but has not thought fit to publish the message sent into Cadiz by the Admiral.

The same prudent concealment is observed with regard to the events in the North of Spain, and the proceedings of the Asturias.

We cannot avoid particularly referring our Readers to the Speech made by the Councillor of State REGNAULT DE ST. JEAN D'ANGELY, as the grounds of the Senatus Consultum, for uniting Tuscany to France. Probably this is the most important document to England which France has published during the war. The whole coast of the Mediterranean Sea, it appears, must form a part of the French territory—and as it was continually necessary to violate the neutrality of Tuscany, because of her partiality for England, it was requisite to remedy the evil, by taking possession of her altogether.

A similar necessity to that which makes Tuscany a part of France, constitutes the Temporalities of the Holy See, a part of the kingdom of Italy, a Decree to that purpose having been published at Rome on the 21st ult. It is rumoured on the Continent, that the Pope is actually resolved to excommunicate BONAPARTE for this sacrilegious contempt of the rights of the Church; and some of our Newspaper Writers are already speculating upon the effect this must produce in the minds of the Catholics under his subjection.

No intelligence has arrived from Gottenburgh of the least importance. Our armament still remained unemployed when the last letters came away, which, however, throw no light on the cause.

Mr. CANNING stated on Friday night, in answer to Mr. WHITBREAD, that the British Force was sent to act under the absolute discretion and orders of his SWEDISH MAJESTY, and that Ministers are no way blameable, if in the interval which has elapsed, considerable changes have taken place in the posture of affairs, and military councils of Sweden. This is true, but those who are at a loss to discover any thing relative to Sweden, which has not long been foreseen, may still be permitted to doubt the propriety of sending out large Expeditions, without some previous plan of intended operation.

e Duke of ABRANTES has communicated to the Por- ese, the reception of their Deputies at Bayonne, by ng public an extract from a letter written from thence the 28th of April, in which they inform their coun- en of the gracious deportment of NAPOLEON; who ob- d, that the great distance which separates Portugal the seat of Government in France, does not permit atching over the concerns of that kingdom, with the care and solicitude as over the interests of his other ects: that their future independance rested upon their conduct, but that he would endure no English Colony he Continent; and finally, that it depended on the security with which they should embrace the general cause that would entitle them to have a Prince to govern them, and to fill a rank among the Powers of Europe.

We learn from undoubted authority, that Government is about to establish an Ordnance Depôt at Weedon, in Northamptonshire, of extraordinary magnitude and importance. As also barracks and accommodation for several brigades of artillery. The central situation of Weedon is the cause of its being selected for this purpose, the measure being connected with other plans for the internal defence of the country.

Yesterday his Majesty rode in the Great Park, accompanied by three of the Princesses.

The Queen and the other Princesses rode to Frogmore in the morning, and partook of a cold collation.

General Sir A. Wellesley was expected in Cork on Saturday last. The whole of the expedition which is to be placed under his command was quite ready on the preceding day.

It is reported that the troops which sailed under General Spencer for Cadiz, have returned to Gibraltar.

The Swallow sloop has sailed from Plymouth, with four transports, having on board 80,000 pikes, 5000 stand of arms, and ordnance stores, together with 250 men belonging to the Royal Artillery and the Royal Artillery Drivers. The Aigle frigate sailed also from Plymouth for St. Sebastian and Gijon, with further supplies. Gunpowder and stores are also shipping at Dover, and a company of artillery has been directed to march from thence to Portsmouth with all possible speed. A detachment of the 20th Dragoons, consisting of about 350 men, is to be embarked at Portsmouth as soon as the ships are ready to receive them. The plan, we understand, is to send a great number of frigates to different parts of the Spanish coast. These frigates will have supplies of powder, ball, arms, and other necessaries on board, which will be landed on the requisition of the leaders of the patriots. Transports will also be sent with provisions, if necessary. As the patriots are in great want of artillerymen, Government, as we have already stated, have sent a detachment with the first supplies of arms and ammunition. Other detachments will follow as fast as possible.

The Spaniards will, if determined to defend themselves, have incalculable advantages, owing to the badness of the roads. In the whole kingdom (except in the vicinity of the metropolis, and some of the great towns), there is scarcely a good public road. The soil of the kingdom is generally loam, and after a shower is so very slippery, as to render it always difficult to tread. From the 1st of May, till the middle of September, there is no rain, except very trifling, limited, and partial showers. When the wet sets it comes in torrents, is of long duration, and renders the roads impassable.

On the 9th ult. the Royal College of Surgeons adjudged the Jacksonian Prize, for 1807, to John Hyslop, Esq. Surgeon, Fenchurch-street, for the best Dissertation on "Diseases of the Eye, and its Appendages—and the Treatment of them." The same gentleman obtained the Prize, 1805, from the Royal College, for the best Treatise on "Injuries of the Head from external Violence."

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Thursday, his Majesty arrived in town, from Windsor, and held a private levee. The following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty :—

The Rev. Dr John Luxmore, the Bishop of Bristol, on his translation to the See of Hereford; Lieutenant-General Sir Eyre Coote, on his return from the Government of Jamaica; Major General Gordon, on his promotion; and on his appointment to the Staff; Major General Lord Charles, on coming to his title.

His Majesty held a Privy Council, and gave audiences to the Duke of Portland, and the rest of the Cabinet Ministers.

The Faux Pas which the fashionable world have been some days discussing, occurred at an inn at Winchester, between a sporting Lord and a Lady of the Ton. Much anxiety was expressed by the Lady respecting her character; she positively declared her innocence, and that she entered the apartment of his Lordship by mistake! On the other hand, it is affirmed, that she was seen secretly to enter the room and shut the door after her. The circumstances, however, will be more fully discussed next term by the gentlemen of the long robe. The Noble Lord, it is said, offered Mr. Taylor, the peeping landlord, 5000*l*. for himself, and 1000*l*. for each of his five children, on condition he should not divulge the secret; but honest Boniface indignantly refused the offer, and drove off in a chaise and four to Southampton, to inform the husband of his dishonour.

The expected trial of two paramours, in a recent Crim. Con. case, has been considered as a novelty in that department; but surely since the Lady has tried them both, it is not unfair in the husband to try them also.

In order to satisfy the Committee at a certain Tavern near St. James's, the Innkeepers recommend that the Members should be wrapped up in foolscap, so that by a magical dash of the pen they may go free of Postage.

Though Buonaparte, by sending for brother Joseph, seems inclined to shave the Spaniards with new invented Naples soap, it is to be hoped they will not suffer it to be done without a brush.

A club of authors, a few evenings ago, complaining of the copy-right bill as oppresive, an Hibernian brother of the quill observed, that the bill for privately stealing was certainly in their favour.

An Hibernian agriculturist, who came over to the sheep-shearing, anxiously enquiring for the best show of Theaves, was directed by a Cockney to Bow-Street.

Some Irish labourers trudging up to town, described themselves as being engaged for the Hay market.

CITY.

Tuesday, the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be reduced half an assize or 1d. in the peck loaf: the quartern loaf of wheaten 12d. and houshold 10½d.

Friday a Common Hall was held at Guildhall, for the election of various Officers annually chosen on that day, which was numerously attended. Upon the show of hands being taken, the Sheriffs were of opinion the election had fallen upon Joshua Jonathan Smith, Esq. and Claudius Stephen Hunter, Esq. and made their report accordingly; upon which the Recorder declared them to be duly elected Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, and they were called forth to declare their consent to take upon them the office.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Thursday a General Court was held at the East-India House, when the dividend on the half-year, commencing the 5th of January last, and ending the 5th of July next, was declared to be 5½ per cent.

The Chairman acquainted the Court, that the petition to the House of Commons, approved on the last General Court, had been presented, and referred to the Committee for investigating the Company's Affairs; that, in consequence of the first Report from that Committee, the House had resolved, that a sum not exceeding 1,500,000*l*. be paid to the Company, on account of expences incurred by them in the public service; and that it was understood that the Committee are to continue their investigation of the several matters contained in the Company's petition, and to report further to the House.

John Julius Angerstein, William Drewe, and Robert Hunter, Esqs. Sir Henry Strachey, Bart. George Samuel Wegg, John Clements, and George Cumming, Esqs. were appointed a Committee to inspect the Company's bye-laws

The titles of several papers, presented to the House of Commons, having been read, the Court adjourned sine die.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

On Monday evening the play of The Stranger was a this theatre. The part of The Stranger was represented Young. This is one of the characters in which he app greatest advantage; and although there are some ha of manner, and other defects to be noticed in his perform , yet it deserves to be considered, on the whole, as a v client piece of acting: and, perhaps, except his Ham best effort that he has made upon the boards of a London

Mrs. Bellamy, whose performance of Angela, in The Spectre, we noticed in the last Number of The National ter, performed the part of Mrs. Haller. There are man and actresses, who, without much science in their professi feeling enough to act tolerably well in scenes of very motion. But having no real knowledge of the art whi exercise, they only please while the stimulus operates; stant the feeling ceases, or becomes of so delicate a ly to touch, not to siese and fill the soul, they grow t duke to themselves and to their audiences. Little pa though they seem of small importance individually, yet action may, perhaps, go further in explaining the t ought or feeling that belongs to each character, than enes that appear to contain vivid passion. Mrs. Hal stance, has two scenes of very lively emotion; one in she relates her story to the Countess, and the other in wh meets her husband, at the conclusion of the play. But ese, Mrs. Haller has many passages that mark her cha or rather the character of her sorrow, in a very particula any oblique speeches made to Baron Steinfort, and t ow, and to the Lady's maid: things which, though w elivered, they are not observed by a common audience, well expressed, have a great weight in effecting the gene pression which the character ought to produce.

Mrs. Bellamy did not appear to catch the delicacies part. She played the principal scene with a great deal ing: but these nicer passages seemed to have escaped her ress who represents Mrs. Haller, should make tend gentleness, sweetness of manner, the principal expressions. or twice these soft and winning virtues are intercepted by story vehemence: but it is the vehemence of a full heart bad temper. Beneath that tenderness, gentleness, and ness, which we have recommended, there must be a c appearance of sorrow. The tranquillity of Mrs. Haller acter is but a thin surface: the depth beneath is sad an fortless. But Mrs. Haller is never morose: her melanc of a lovely nature: her own wretchedness has taught her the more deeply for those who surround her. Mrs. Bella performing the earlier scenes of the part, scenes, in whi amiable sorrow is particularly seen, was not sufficiently or sorrowful. She spoke sometimes with a degree of s not accordant with a gentle temper, and sometimes with a of indifference not accordant with a bursting heart. The in such points as these, shows a want of professional know which we hope Mrs. Bellamy, with the advantages of London actors in the winter, will take pains to supply.

we say that Mrs. Bellamy seems to want knowledge of he fession, we do not mean mere knowledge of the stage, beca seems to possess that in a very conspicuous degree; but m may know the stage perfectly, and yet know nothing of his sion. Knowledge of the stage refers almost entirely to th of the spectators; knowledge of the profession refers to cearts; a skilful and graceful method of making an exit, of ing the action, and of walking the boards, will gain fo an the reputation of knowing the stage. Perhaps Mr. D'Eg the ballet-master, knows it as well as Mr. Kemble. Bu is not a knowledge of the profession of acting. This know relates to soul, not matter, grace of action, and the know of the stage, are the mere executive branches of the art, as sification is of the art of poetry, or colouring of the art of p ing. A tragic actor, who knows his profession, must kno appearances of the human heart; and that is the reason wh have so few good tragedians; a comic actor only needs kno manners of men, which, lying on the surface, are more e learnt, and therefore we have many good comedians But th actor should remember that there is a shorter way of stu the human heart, than studying it from nature alone. He study it from those authors, and actors, those poets, and ters, who have been acknowledged to copy her faithfully. that we recommend the study of an original by its copy a but any actor, by studying original nature, with a copy as fore him, will learn much more quickly the best mode of i himself, and the most striking process of producing his than he can by studying nature without the advantage of

The earliest artists in every sphere of genius, were to study from nature alone, and find out the best modes ing and adorning her; but in these times we have the ad- of models in art, and we should be foolish indeed not to them. The use of a model then to a young artist, is not him as an original from which he may make another ut to shew him the manner in which the greatest artists im have been in the habit of studying nature for practi- ioses.

hatever be the best mode of acquiring a knowledge of natic art, of this at least, every actor and actress rfectly assure themselves, that, without acquiring that ge by some process or other, they can never attain a k in their profession.

COVENT-GARDEN.

orrow evening Coven-Garden will close the longest sea- g which it has been kept open within our recollection. ea a season particularly unfruitful in literary excellence. the truth is, that as long as the present system of manage- ment is to be carried on, the town cannot expect any e good plays. Mr. Harris gives no encouragement to the hors, and we know pretty well what sort of beings uld uses whom he does encourage. The whim of Mr. s amuses once a year, and once in two or three years, r. Coleman or Mr. Morton brings out a play: but except ce, who is there that has any pretensions to be consider- author of great merit? and these three, who, altogether, robably upon an average furnish two pieces in a year heatre, are all the dependence of that great and wealthy In some future number, we shall probably submit to ers a plan for the better conducting of the theatres in o the production of new pieces. At present the bounty rown in granting the patent is exercised to please Mr. not to instruct and amuse the people; and this, we is a destribution of that bounty, which neither is just ountry, nor was designed by the King. We do not say n any personal spite to Mr. Harris; it is a matter of portance to us, whether Mr. Harris, or Mr. Anybody wanton in the public loss; but we think that it is high system were ended. Mr. Harris, it is true, might get oney, by bringing out good pieces, than by acting the d Little Thumb, or Bonifacio and Bridgetina, or Two der a Hood; but mere money does not seem to be Mr. object; he likes to exercise his own humour. Now we great desire to curtail Mr. Harris's enjoyment of his own we object only to see him enjoying it at the expence blic. If he is a man of very strong prejudices, or very , or both, his friends may be sorry for that, but there reason why the public should pay for it.

g therefore as Mr. Harris continues to thrust upon the t collection of wretched stuff which for so long a time excluded merit, and served only all not conceive ourselves blameable in occupying a ur paper with the censure of his mismanagement. Nor tend to confine ourselves to the statements of his misma- alone! the injustice of theatrical tyranny in Drury- well as in Covent-Garden, will not find our censures very lled: for we have little personal knowledge of any of rietors, and what we write is therefore written by no th a view of gratifying any private pique against any r individual, but with the general view, and we believe venture to say, the honest view, of opening to the pub- public road which party and prejudice appear to have of obtaining fair chances and opportunities for every or in the writing or the acting of plays, and of estab- as far as the effort of an individual work can establish, of equality in the republic of letters, which is as de- here as in the political world, although perhaps am- and intriguing members contrive to raise an aristo- uch oftener in literature than in politics. There are nds of offences against society which the law cannot Public censure, the ill report of the world, are the only gns of such delinquencies. As long as we continue to twig of that public rod, we will not forget its powers. s; those whom we cannot influence by argument in the ses, nor punish by law in the second, we will yet hold animadversion of the public—for their public offences. at once more that these observations are personally di- gainst no one individual; it is general injustice we wish o, and we fear our particular instances of delinquency are likely to be too numerous to leave any suspicion of individual malignity on our parts. The season has now closed at both the winter theatres; but when the next season shall commence, we hope to resume our labours; nor is it our intention to cease from those labours, till we shall have effectually assisted ——— to stem Oppression's tide,

To lash Presumption, Prejudice, and Pride,
To drag Corruption from her caves of night,
And force her forward on the public sight,
To track the knave through all his doubling chace,

LAW REPORT.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, June 23.

The Court passed sentence upon two men, Ball and Smith, convicted of a conspiracy to procure the liberation of a person named M'Culloch, who was prisoner in the King's Bench prison for 17001. The way they did it was, by falsely deposing to a notice of bail having been served upon the plaintiff's attorney, and then putting in sham bail, by which the party was liberated, and has since sailed to the West Indies. The consequence is that they deprive the plaintiff of his security for debts and costs, amounting to 2000*l*.

Mr. Justice GROSE pronounced the judgment of the Court, which was, that the defendants should be imprisoned 18 months in Newgate, and stand in the pillory in Old Palace-yard, Westminster.

CIRCUITS.

Previous to the Judges taking their seats in their respective Courts, they met in the Chamber of the Lord CHIEF JUSTICE, and chose their Circuits as follow:—

The Home Department.—Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough, and Chief Baron Macdonald.
The Norfolk.—Sir James Mansfield, and Mr. Justice Heath.
The Northern.—Mr. Justice Chambre, and Baron Wood.
The Oxford.—Mr. Justice Lawrence, and Mr. Justice Le Blanc.
The Western.—Baron Graham, and Mr. Justice Bailey.
The Midland.—Mr. Justice Grose, and Baron Thompson.

The Commission day at Hertford in the Home Circuit, is fix- for Monday the 1st of August.

SATURDAY, JUNE 25.

THE KING v. WHITE AND HART.

This was an indictment against the Defendants, the Editor and Printer of The Independant Whig, for inserting a libel upon Lord Ellenborough, with a view to injure his character as a Judge, and as a Peer of Parliament. The Libels were two Letters, signed Junius; the one inserted on the 20th December, 1807, and the other on the 17th June, 1808. The publications were proved in the usual way, and Mr. Clifford addressed the Jury for three hours in defence. The trial lasted till near five o'clock, when the Jury found both the Defendants—Guilty.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

We have the pleasure to announce the safe arrival in the Downs of his Majesty's ship the Sceptre, Capt. Joseph Bingham, with three valuable Danish East Indiamen, two of which are prizes to the Sceptre, and the third is a prize to his Majesty's sloop of war, the Cormorant. The Sceptre sailed from Madras late in the month of December last, and had but just reached her station off the Cape of Good Hope, when, falling in with an English privater, she learned that war had been declared against Denmark, and the very next day she had the good fortune to capture the two homeward-bound Indiamen, the Norge and the Cron Princess Maria. Ten days before the Sceptre sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, the Martha, an American ship, with a very rich homeward-bound cargo, arrived at that place from Bengal. This vessel was also captured by the Sceptre, and delivered over, with all her papers and private letters, to the Court of Admiralty of that colony, for adjudication.

MARRIED.

Lord Arthur Somerset, to the Hon. Miss Boscawen. After the ceremony they set off for Lord Falmouth's seat in Berkshire.

DIED.

At Clochfoldich, May 28, Lieut. Colonel Alexander Stewart, late of the 42d regiment of foot, which he commanded on the 21st of March, 1801, in the battle of Alexandria.

Mr. Pears, of Wansford. He had been ill for some time, but was so much better on Sunday, that he had a party of friends to visit him. He left them to go to another room, which he had no sooner reached, than he dropped down and expired.

CORN EXCHANGE.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23.—Since Monday our fresh supplies of grain have not been large; but there is plenty of all kinds on hand. Wheat is dull, but prices not lower. Barley and Beans with difficulty meet sale, and they scarcely support Monday's rates. The Oat trade was very heavy this morning, and what few sales were made, was at less prices.

ON THE DELIVERANCE OF EUROPE.

the history of nations, ancient and modern, we may ver many important periods, when a departure from ual and acknowledged maxims of Government may cessary, but shall not be able to enumerate many ines, either in rulers or people, of an early conviction e fact. Nor is this wonderful—its own particular ience ever forms the wisdom of the multitude, and it ural for common understandings to sanctify the poli-d conduct which has hitherto guided them with safety rosperity. It would be better were the general run of men exempt from the force of this observation, but oo true, that in questions of nice discernment, they frequently follow than lead the public mind. Indeed potic Governments, swayed by a race of Sovereigns g standing, the nominal Ministers can scarcely be ered responsible, being commonly the mere organs unto of courtiers and men of ribband, little likely ceive the spirit of the crisis, and still less disposed upon it. In free States, it is to be lamented, that re mostly raised by, and consequently slaves to a —a bondage little compatible with the freedom and n which great emergencies require.

complete subversion of all the old and jarring inte-France by the Revolution, and the necessary creaf new by superior ability alone, have given a spirit nsistency to her plans, however daring. The terriergies which every ruling faction has been enabled to rth, could hardly be successfully encountered by the out maxims, leisurely preparation, and cautious ents of old Governments; who, in addition to these utional defects, for a long time entertained a most ded contempt for their formidable enemy. In the dominions, this mistake has been peculiarly predo-
, and is not even yet entirely removed. But on ntinent the public mind appears to have verged to posite extreme, and to regard all further opposition less. Fruitless indeed it would be, if not exerted rinciples and views, and with a courage and ability ther different from the past. They who begin prenously, generally end abjectly; and nothing can tend certainly to defeat than a mistaken opinion of the and resources of an opposing power.

teat hope of the Deliverance of Europe may, how-still be indulged, even from the great daring of the
, if the insulted Governments were prepared and d to adopt that line of conduct which is alone equal crisis. To lay aside their mutual jealousies, and sent) ridiculous fears of each other—To combine in and with confidence—To trust less to their tactics—all, to awaken the spirit of vengeance in the people, prove the rising ferment which the excessive tyranny olence of France seems calculated to produce. If ould ultimately fail, the rock upon which he will split, will be his pressure on the feelings of the community, not of Kings and Princes, but of Common Men. It should appear by the events detailed in another part of this Paper, that his extraordinary success has inspired him with too great a contempt of the effect produced by a sense of insult and oppression. A feeling which we have reason to conclude from the aspect of continental intelligence, and the agitation evidently prevailing in other places besides Spain—more likely to be urged into effectual effort than all the plans of all the Cabinets upon earth without it.

Should it therefore again prove necessary to give our aid to a general cause, let us determine in what spirit, and with what views we should offer it.

It frequently happens, in the common intercourse of life, that individuals, who have points of mutual interest to adjust, become weary of practising upon each other all the artifice and rules of common-place prudence, and suddenly perceive the policy of a frankness directly the reverse. The most important principle of combination has been seized, and the minor considerations before thought of so much consequence, have quickly found their proper station.—Let us give the reins to our imagination, and suppose a British Deputation, addressing a Continental Congress in the following manner:—

"The times are past, Noble Sirs, when over a board of "green cloth, we could rehearse at leisure all the etiquette "of diplomacy; advance our greater and lesser considera- "tions directly in the proper place, and balance equiva- "lents, imaginary or real, with all that gravity and decorum "which gives an air of dignity to finesse and deception. "Most sincerely we lament these times are no more, but "now that an overwhelming evil threatens the political "existence of many, and the welfare of all, it is right to "dispense with the ceremonious amusement of happier "æras, and mutually resolve to meet the common enemy "with all the alacrity of hope, and all the courage of "despair. We hesitate not to confess, that we have been too "much attached to sugar islands which we did not want, "and secret expeditions against points of little consequence, "except to certain commercial factions, whose foresight "extended only to the first or second shipment. That we "have entertained these partial aims we allow, but they "have not been unaccompanied by the most zealous "exertions of a more disinterested nature, by the waste of "lives and treasure, unexampled, when considered as the "contribution of a single state, and by a disposition (not "always prudently exhibited we own) to urge others to "their due proportion of endeavour in the universal cause.

"No longer then let the artifice of the enemy "delude your understanding, by exciting jealousy at "our maritime and commercial superiority—a supe- "riority which has not been usurped, but which is "the natural result of our insular situation, our in- "trinsic freedom, and the long possession of capital, ma- "nufacture and credit. Emulate these advantages, "if you can, as far as your situation will admit, seek "the same effects by the same means; but do not " permit a peevish disgust at our prosperity to blind you to

" that organized and systematic encroachment, which is " labouring to subvert your rights, liberties, and inde" pendence, as nations and as men. Short-sighted, indeed,
" must be the reigning families which still remain, if they " longer permit themselves to hope that their thrones may " be retained without the most unequivocal resolution to " defend them. Still more deceived must be the people, " who imagine a change of dynasty is all they have to ap" prehend, and amuse themselves with the idea, that it is " a mere passion for King-making which induces their " enslaver to interest himself in their concerns. Let us
" do him the justice to acknowledge, that his designs,
" whatever they contain of the unjust, have but little of " the frivolous. The principle of his federal system is the " permanent dominion of France, and the complete sub" jection of all other nations and languages within his " reach. His Kings will be mere satraps, creatures of his " will, and removeable at his pleasure. The expences of " Sovereignty, and the burthen of tribute, will be all the " share of the people in their own affairs. Petty Magis" trates, and inferior Officers, they may indeed become,
" but Frenchmen will be their rulers—Frenchmen will lead
" their armies—Frenchmen will reap the fruit of all their " energies—and the unspeakable arroganee of that domi-
" neering nation will be encountered through all the rami" fications of society, public and domestic.

" We, appeal, therefore to the scenes passing before your " eyes, as to facts which cannot be controverted; we call " upon you to wake from the slumber of apathy, and the " torpor of fear to a resistance proportionate to the destruc" tion which assails you. Do not imagine that, untaught by " experience, we are again anxious to subsidise you into the " employment of a spiritless body of troops, officered by " Generals with heads full of the events of the seven years " war? No, if you cannot convey to your population some " of that noble principle which animates men to die for their " country and countrymen, and to an abhorrence of foreign " rule—if your great men cannot resolve to share in the " glory and the danger with the mass of the people—above
" all, if you do not resolve to sacrifice all the petty jea" lousies, factions, and party views of less eventful times,
" and trust talent alone with the management of your affairs,
" you may as well receive at once your conqueror, and " your master. But if, on the contrary, this hatred of " treachery, of tyranny, and oppression, can be made to " act upon the common mind and common feeling, and to " call the energies of your respective countries into " action, we promise you all the aid and co-operation of " our great resources; to make your cause our own; to " abide by you in danger; to shed our blood freely in your " defence; and, unbiassed by any narrow views of parti" cular advantage, to look only to the absolute good which " must result to ourselves, our immediate posterity, and
" the remotest after-times from a successful opposition, to " the most daring plan of universal dominion which inso-
" solence, ferocity, and talent, ever attempted to impose
" on the sons of men."

We will not contend for the form of our address, but if we mean again to proffer assistance to the Continent, are not these the terms upon which it should be given, and the spirit with which it should be offered?

Some of erences were held in the presence of the First Minister, os, who distinguished himself upon the occasion, as marked in the Junta of the 5th of May, and at these s there was much altercation. Subsequently to them, Ferdinand was deprived of his carriage, and of his honour, remaining only with the Commandant of his ard, a Jewish officer of the National Guard of Bay- om this moment the state of things became changed, eon now assumed towards the Prince a different and spect; intimating to the noblemen who accompanied that they should answer with their heads for the se- is person, which produced amidst them a sudden de- The object of these conferences seemed to be that of ne for the arrival of Godoy, and of the King and But in the meanwhile Napoleon intimated to Ferdi- the reign of the Bourbons was at an end; adding, that eir interests were at variance, and that the continuance tre in their hands could no longer conduce to the de- t of his plans, and the vast political objects he had in otwithstanding this, however, he pressed Ferdinand he kingdom of Etruria, and directed the Grandees to eir Prince to accede to his proposal—Ferdinand an- ddly, " I will not accept the Crown of Etruria, nor in the world, whilst nature gives me a rightful claim Spain.—My only ambition is to render my people nd I would chose to die in the midst of my faithful though it were my fate to wear the chains of servi- to resign whatever would most attach me to life."— og, afterwards, Napoleon with having deceived him, iting him to visit France—he answered, if he had not come voluntary, he should have made him by force. On the arrival of Godoy, and the King and Queen, who were received and entertained with the greatest magnificence, the Sitting, or Congress of the 5th of May, was held, at which Napoleon First and Charles Fourth presided; present, the Queen Maria Louisa, the Infanta Don Carlos, Godoy, the Grandees of Spain, and the First Minister Zevallos. The Queen, transported with rage, addressed her Son Ferdinand, " Traitor and wretch, for years you have been imagining and contriving the death of the King your Father, but by the vigilance of the Prince of the Peace, by zeal and loyalty, you have not attained your object. Neither you, nor those traitors who have served or co-operated with you in your base designs. I tell you to your face that you are my son, and not the son of the King.—Yes, without having other right to the Crown, than that which you derive from your mother, you have sought to wrest it from us by force; but I will and consent that the Great Napoleon shall be the arbitrator between us, in favour of whom, we renounce and cede our right, to the exclusion of our family. I call upon him to punish you and your associates as traitors, and I commit the whole nation to Napoleon."—Napoleon put an end to this rage, by saying—" No!—I give to Ferdinand the Crown of Naples, and to Carlos that of Etruria, together with two of my nieces in marriage. Let them say if they will accede to this proposal."—To this the Infanta Don Carlos boldly answered, " Emperor, I was not born to be a King, but Infanta of Spain."—And addressing his brother—" And you, my brother and king, speak, do not be alarmed, defend your right, you are a Spaniard; your country will be ready to sacrifice its blood for you and its independence. Be not alarmed, but let us go hence, though it were to the scaffold, or perpetual imprisonment. For that Providence which directs a faithful nation, shall in due time visit his vengeance upon a faithless Emperor, who can thus disregard his own promise, and lay aside every semblance of right and reason. Ah! Fernando, who robs you of the Crown of Spain? an ignorant father, an infamous mother, and her favourite Godoy. He, in truth, is the traitor, the plotter of the death of your father, the usurper of the legitimate rights of your family, the author of the calumny, and an apostate in religion. Who countenances these machinations?—The tyranny of an Emperor, to whom we have looked for protection."—And he finished by saying, " Napoleon, I am no longer an Infant of Spain, but I was born one!"—The Minister Zevallos then began to speak, and with a flowing eloquence, apostrophizing Godoy, he said, " Infamous man, unworthy the name of a Spaniard, you have sold your Country and your Prince! But the same Emperor, who now appears to protect you, has decreed within himself your punishment, and that of the parent King. Do you not behold, traitor! how he is taking advantage every moment of these contentions? Ah! how could you have influenced the minds of these miserable parents towards their children? But your error—your crimes—You ought to have done your duty towards them, though it were only in return for having saved your life from the fury of the populace. Answer! But I believe it impossible.—'Tis not so with me, who am a loyal Spaniard, the second person in the nation, and first subject of the King. But Zevallos has religiously fulfilled his duty! and you have always trembled before Zevallos." He continued speaking thus for near an hour and a quarter; so that the Emperor knew not what to answer in refutation of the arguments he advanced. In this predicament, recurring to his authority, he ordered to be taken from his presence this phenomenon, saying, " 'twas impossible that the earth should subsist a man of so much freedom before the Emperor of the French. But I'll reward you for it." M. Zevallos went out; and M. Gomez spoke afterwards. But it was finally decreed by Napoleon I. and Charles IV. that Ferdinand VII. should renounce the Crown to his Father in the space of six hours. Under this violence, he was compelled to do it; but with certain restrictions, which Napoleon was ready to admit, and which he did agree to with Charles IV. The latter finally consented to abdicate and cede his Crown to Napoleon; who in turn transferred it to his brother Joseph I. at Naples—nominating, in the mean time, that the Grand Duke of Berg should be Lieutenant of the Kingdom.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, JUNE 9.—It is observed, that the exchange of Couriers with the first Courts of Europe is more frequent than formerly. It appears as if important affairs are under consideration, for on the 14th a great conference is to be held, at which the Archdukes are to preside, and all the Governors of the hereditary dominions, who are now here, are to be present. The result of the assembly is to be laid before his Majesty on his arrival. Last night the Archduke John departed hence unexpectedly; it is supposed he is gone to the Emperor. "The late events in Spain and the Papal dominions have caused a strong sensation, and given occasion to many secret conferences among the Ministers of the different Courts residing here."

STATE PAPERS.

Published in the Moniteur as the Documents accompanying the Accession of Joseph Bonaparte to the Throne of Spain.

ADDRESS OF THE SUPREME JUNTA OF THE GOVERNMENT TO HIS MAJESTY THE EMPEROR AND KING.

"Those who at critical and difficult periods are placed nearest the Government, and who have at all times shewn themselves to be good and faithful subjects, can and ought to avow their sentiments when the welfare of their country requires it. Convinced that the condition of Spain and all its concerns demand the closest connection with that political system of the empire which your Majesty governs with so much glory, we consider that the greatest proof of kindness to the Spanish nation, which our Sovereign ever gave, is their having fixed their last determination on an immoveable basis, and confirmed by a long series of political events. O that there were no Pyrenees! This was the constant wish of good Spaniards; because there could be no Pyrenees, whenever the wants of each should be the same, when confidence should be returned again, and each of the two nations have received, in the same degree, the respect due to their independence and worth. The interval which yet separates us from this happy moment cannot now be long. Your Imperial Majesty, who foresees evey thing, and executes them still more swiftly, has chosen for the provisional Government of Spain, a Prince educated for the art of Government in the great school of your Majesty. He has succeeded in stilling the boldest storms by the moderation and wisdom of his measures. What have we not, therefore, to hope from his deeds, now that all Spaniards unite to devote to him that admiration to which he has so many claims, and assist him in those labours which he applies for our service? The Spanish Monarchy shall resume the rank which belongs to it among the Powers of Europe, as soon as it is united by a new family compact to its natural ally, whose power is so great. Whoever the Prince may be, whom your Majesty destines for us, chosen from among your illustrious family, he will bring that security we so much need; but Spain can urge a plea which none of the other countries connected with your Majesty can dispute. The Spanish Throne rises to a greater height. The consequences arising from its relation to France are of an importance commensurate with the extent of its possessions. It seems, therefore, that the Throne itself calls for your Majesty's eldest brother to govern it. On the other side, it is a happy presage that this arrangement, which nature has confirmed, so well corresponds with the sentiments of reverence and admiration with which the actions of this Prince, and the wisdom of his Government, had inspired us. The Council of Castile, whose wisdom commanded their giving all the support to these principles which stood in their power, unites with the wish of the Supreme Junta. May God grant prosperity to your Imperial and Royal Majesty!

OF THE DEPUTIES TO THE GENERAL EXTRAORDI-NARY JUNTA.

LOYAL SPANIARDS—WORTHY COUNTRYMEN!!!

r families, your fire-sides, your fortunes, and your are as dear and precious to us as our own; and we wish you were all here before us, that you might be assured of it. We have been as faithful and as attached to our ancient dynasty as yourselves, till Divine Providence, which disposes of thrones and sceptres, had fixed the period of its duration. The greatest States furnish us with a thousand instances of the infinite power of Providence; and the history of our own country affords no small number of those instances. An irresistible duty, and an object as sacred as our own felicity, have caused us to abandon our own hearths, and brought us to the invincible Emperor of the French. We confess it: the contemplation of his splendour and power may have made a strong impression upon us, but we came with the determined resolution to make our renewed efforts in behalf of a Monarchy whose prosperity is necessarily connected with our own. But how great was our surprise, when his Imperial and Royal Majesty anticipated our solicitude by manifestations of benevolence and affability, which excited the more astonishment the greater his power is. He has no other desire than our welfare and prosperity. In giving us a Sovereign to reign over us, it is his illustrious brother, Joseph, whose virtues are the admiration of his subjects. In occupying himself in the melioration of our ancient laws, and the correction of their imperfections, this is done that we may live according to the laws of justice and equity. Where he desires that our finance should receive a new organization, this is to render our naval and military force powerful and dreadful to our enemies, by avoiding all superfluous taxation. By a wise Administration, he is resolved to correct abuses; to revive national industry, by removing all the impediments which lie in the way of commerce, and relieve us, as far as is in his power, from all those oppressions which have annihilated our agriculture, and all our sources of enterprise. Finally, knowing the uprightness of your character, and your attachment to the worship of God, he will not oppose your religious zeal. He assures you, that you shall retain, even as your ancesters, your holy Catholic religion, and that the same shall remain, as at the present period, the sole and only governing church in the whole kingdom. And what is the reward which the Great Emperor of the French demands under circumstances so momentous to the nation as these?  That you should live in repose; that you should provide for your households and families; that you should not blindly abandon yourselves to the fatal desolations which are inseparable from resistance and rebellion; that you should await, with peaceful confidence, the melioration of your fates and fortunes, which you may hope for from the Government of a virtuous Monarch—which paternal care shall bring—which is inseparable from his benignity, and of which his subjects have experienced the effects. Spaniards! worthy of a better fate, avoid the dreadful anarchy which threatens you; think upon yourselves, your families, and your children. What profit will you draw from dissentions kindled by malevolence? Ye who are affluent, and peacefully enjoy the property which your family possessed through the industry or public service of your ancestors—honest agriculturists, who know the sweets of domestic comforts—labourious mechanics, who are happy in your own fire-sides, surrounded by all that is dear to you—industrious merchants and manufacturers, who wish to retain the produce of your industry and economy—citizens of all classes, who live in repose with a moderate, but sufficient income, which ye owe to a regular life—bear in mind into what an abyss you are about to plunge yourselves, if you suffer yourselves to be misled by those who excite you to disorder. You run in danger to lose every thing in a moment. What can you hope for that can balance such great sacrifices? What vain expectations glitter before your eyes, which can render you disobedient to the powers which govern over you, and make you shake off the salutary yoke of the laws? Anarchy is the greatest scourge which God can inflict upon a people: while it prevails, it destroys, loosens, consumes, and annihilates every thing, and the best are commonly its most certain victims. The sight cannot reach to the bottom of these calamities and horrors any more than to the shores of this sea of misery. Happy are ye, that ye know not the horrors of civil war. Spain has long been freed from this horror. Yet in spite of the period which is elapsed, she is not yet recovered from the calamities which during the first years of that age, she on that account endured. Why are they no longer living who were witnesses of it, that their experience might serve to protect you against it? You will invite and bring them upon you, if you do not give an hearing to the voice of the Government, and listen to our brotherly counsels. Ah, how can you offer any resistance to the mighty force which will be brought against you? No man doubts Spanish valour; we know that you are able to attempt great things, to bid defiance to dangers; but without resources, discipline, and concord, all those attempts would be vain. The most numerous assemblies of people are scattered before a disciplined army, like clouds before the gentlest wind. No, do not flatter yourselves that you will gain by conflict. You must yield at last, and then all will be lost. We cannot dissemble this. The prosperity of the State depends alone upon the unanimity and the uprightness with which we all cordially unite with the new Government, and co-operate with it in the meliorations which it is preparing for the benefit of our country. We are indeed fallen into a very hapless condition; and what else has brought us into this condition but the obstinate, unfeeling, and unjust Government, under which we have lived these 20 years? What remains for us to do? To behave submissively, and each for himself contribute to the organization of the new Government, upon principles which cannot be shaken, which may preserve the freedom, the rights, and the property of each individual. This is what the invincible Napoleon requires, who is employed in providing for our felicity, who will deserve of our country, and gain from posterity, the appellation of its restorer. Let us place no impediment in the way of this regeneration, nor of the great good which will arise from our close union with our might Ally. Such are the feelings which his Highness the Lieutenant General of the Kingdom, the Junta, the Council of Castile—which the supreme power of the nation have endeavoured to impress, and these are also those with which we wish to see you penetrated, that, returning to peace and order, you may await every thing from the mighty and beneficent hand upon which we all depend. May Heaven grant that this sincere remonstrance, suggested to us by the purest patriotism, may have the salutary effect of pressing the designs of the rebellious, who labour to incite you to disorder, and of establishing, henceforth, peace and confidence among you!"

[The inauguration act of his Majesty, Don Joseph, by which he declares his acceptance of the Spanish Crown, has also reached us. The Proclamation is full of professions not in the least interesting.]

THE KINGDOM OF GALICIA.

"Galicians!—You have bewailed the fate of your amiable Ferdinand—the horror of the perfidy by which he was seduced, still burns in your bosoms. You fear danger to our holy religion, you look upon our exterior worship as annihilated, upon our altars profaned, and the temples of the eternal and sole Omnipotent converted into places of desolation by order of the Tyrant, who arrogates to himself the title of Arbiter of Destinies, because he has succeeded in oppressing the noble French nation, without recollecting, that he himself is mortal, and that he only holds the power delegated to him for our chastisement. You turned your eyes towards the Municipal Authorities, and you even insulted them; because they did not animate the flame of your indignation against the enemy. The time is come—your kingdom has assembled in Cortes, and re-assumed the sovereign authority, which under such circumstances devolves upon it by right, and of which its first exercise is in complying with your wishes so loudly declared; you have already a leader, and the most vigorous dispositions are taking—fly therefore to arms! and let us march to defend the cause of God, the honour of our country, our lives and our fortunes! Will you be insensible to the voice of the nation, and will you only be found valiant in the streets of your cities? Now that twenty thousand brave Soldiers have taken up your cause for theirs, will you refuse to unite with their generous battalions? Will you hesitate to embody yourselves with these masters of the military art? Do you imagine, forsooth, that your courage without discipline can be useful? Such ideas avaunt—receive in your arms these heroes who are going to marshal your strength, and only from the common name of Spaniards, even without being Galicians, feel a deep interest in your cause. The Kingdom sends them to you. You should obey their sovereign and legitimate authority. Let discord fly from us; we are brothers, and are going to sacrifice ourselves for the same sacred cause.

Galicians! enrol yourselves from 16 to 40 years of age. It is better to die in defence of your religion and firesides, and in your own country, than to be led bound to slaughter in order to satisfy an inordinate ambition. The French Conscription comprises you. If you do not serve your Kingdom, you will go and die in the North. We lose nothing. For even should we be unsuccessful, we shall have freed ourselves by a glorious death from the galling chains of a foreign yoke. But there is no reason to fear this peril—Death has alarms only for Poltroons—and God, for whose cause we are going to fi watch over us, because, in the end, every mortal ha mined measure, and we ought to trust in his mercy, t his wrath (which we so much deserve) is appeased, he tect us. The Standard of your Holy Patron Saint Jam unfurled; let us follow it.

"Galicians!—The Asturians and Alouese have 8 enlisted, and already 20,000 under arms—let us go a our brethren, these intrepid men. We shall thus save try from becoming the theatre of war. This kingdo has assembled through your instance, expects it from kingdom will reward those who distinguished themsel every thing in its power, and at the conclusion of the w immediately give you your discharge, and enable yo the fruits of victory under the shade of the laurels you won, and consign to your children at your ease, the e your glorious deeds.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

The House was occupied in some routine business on Monday and Tuesday, and adjourned till Thursday.

THURSDAY, JUNE 30.

STIPENDIARY CURATES BILL.

On the third reading being moved, according to the order of the day,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR declared, that the gradation of power and controul vested by the clauses of Appeal, would excite jealously and hatred amongst the different classes of Ministers, whilst the remedy sought could not be obtained under the Bill in its present shape. If he were to deliver his opinion as a lawyer, he would say, that a Bill more advantageous to quitam Attornies could not be introduced; he should therefore willingly, before the House decided, hear the sentiments of the Right Rev. Bench on the subject.

THE BISHOP OF ROCHESTER rose and said, that the diocese over which he presided was so small, as not to furnish a sufficient number of instances by which any criterion for judgment could be established. He could, however, assure their Lordships, that this was a measure to which he paid great attention. Their Lordships must be aware that nothing could tend so effectually to the support and maintenance of the established religion as union amongst its Clergy. By the clauses of this Bill the Curate and the Rector would be set at variance in the first instance, and then their superiors were to be involved in the contest by the power of appeal; so that from beginning to end there would be nothing but one scene of confusion, distrust, and jealousy.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON regretted the necessity which he felt of dissenting from the Right Reverend Prelate, who had just delivered his opinion; but, he felt it incumbent on him to give his feeble support to this Bill, because he was convinced that it would promote the interests of religion, and give additional security to the established Church.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that the Curate, who performed the duty in the absence of the Rector, should have compensation for his trouble; nothing could be more just and equitable than such a provision; much, however, as he favoured and approved the principle, he was sorry that the clauses made it necessary for him to oppose the Bill.

The question of the third reading being called for and put, was negatived without a division.

LORD MOIRA then moved, that the Bill be rejected, which was also carried without a division.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

The Appropriation Act was then moved to be read a third time, when LORD HOLLAND renewed his objections to the clause which allowed a less sum for the support of Maynooth College than had been granted last year. He argued generally against the impolicy of compelling a number of individuals, who should hereafter possess a great controul over the Irish Catholics, to go for their education into a foreign, and perhaps a hostile country. It had been said that the legislature of no country had ever been called upon to grant money to support a religion different from that which had been established by law, but he begged leave to remark, that the history of the world did not produce another instance of the Legislature of any country producing a system of religion to be established, which was professed by less than one-fifth of the population.

LORD HAWKESBURY said, that the sum voted was deemed sufficient to educate as many Students as were necessary to fill up such vacancies as should occur in the present Irish Catholic Clergy, and that, therefore, there was no necessity for an increased grant.

The Bill was read a third time without a division.

The Scotch Judicature Bill, and the Stamp Duty Bill, were read a third time.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR proposed that an Address be presented to his Majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to increase the salary of Mr. Stracey, Counsel to the Chairman of the Committees in their Lordship's House. His Lordship stated that Mr. Stracey, when he accepted the situation, relinquished his practice as a Barrister, and that his present income, not exceeding six hundred pounds a year, was a very inadequate compensation.—Agreed to.

Commons, in consequence of a clerical error, the word England having been substituted for Great Britain.

After some routine business had been gone through, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, JULY 1.

The Committee of Privileges proceeded on the claims of the Earldom of Roxburgh. The Attorney-General was further heard on the part of the Crown. After some observations from the Lord Chancellor on the impossibility of deciding upon this cause in the course of the present Session, further proceedings were postponed till the first Tuesday in the next Session.

SPAIN, SWEDEN—ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Lord Holland wished to be informed whether any engagement had yet been entered into with Sweden, to give effect on their part to the Orders in Council. Ministers had the power of suspending the execution of the Orders in Council in certain cases by granting licenses; and he was anxious to know what policy in this respect it was intended to adopt in Spain. He did not wish to extort from Ministers any answer that it might be improper to give; but he trusted that a broad and liberal policy would mark the conduct of his Majesty's Ministers with respect to the Spanish nation, and in this view it might be expedient to revoke the Orders in Council so far as regarded the ports of that country. He could not help again adverting to the expediency of issuing a declaration, stating in an open and manly manner our views with respect to Spain, and our determination to assist them, without intermixing any selfish objects, in the recovery of their independence. Upon this subject he felt, in common with every man in the country, the greatest anxiety as to the result; and a great anxiety also to know, as far as it could with propriety be known, what line of policy Ministers would adopt.

Lord Hawkesbury said, with respect to Sweden, that the most satisfactory assurances had been received from the Court of Stockholm, of the disposition of that Court to give every effect to that system which had been adopted in our Orders in Council. It was the wish of his Majesty's Ministers to give every assistance to the Spanish nation that was consistent with the utmost generosity and liberality, without intermixing any partial feelings or selfish objects—every assistance that could tend to ensure to them success in the glorious struggle in which they were now engaged. It was the sentiment of every man in the country, whatever might be his opinion upon other subjects, that every possible assistance should be given to the Spaniards in the contest in which they were now engaged, and his Majesty's Ministers were disposed to render that assistance in the spirit of generosity and liberality, and with a hope that it might lead to that ultimate success which it was the wish of every man in the country should be the result.

Lord Holland observed that the Noble Secretary of State appeared to have misconceived a part of what he had said with respect to the operation of the Orders of Council on our intercourse with Spain. What he was therefore anxious to learn from Ministers was, whether they intended to deal, upon this occasion, in the sale of licences, which he should consider as a narrow and unwise policy; or whether they intended to revoke these Orders so far as regarded the ports of Spain?

Lord Hawkesbury observed, that with respect to what had been said by the Noble Lord, he now clearly understood the object to be to ascertain, whether it was the intention of Ministers to revoke the Orders in Council so far as regarded the Ports of Spain? He could only state, that if the Noble Lord would suspend his curiosity for a few days, he would find that Ministers had not omitted the consideration of this part of the subject, and he had no hesitation in saying, that in this respect, as well as in others, it was their wish to act with the utmost generosity and liberality towards the Spanish nation.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 30.

On the motion of Mr. Lockhart, an Address was voted to his Majesty, that [illegible] graciously pleased to direct the several Archbishops [illegible] by His Order of Council, to make such returns [illegible] within their respective dioceses, up to [illegible] the same may be ready to present to [illegible] Session of Parliament.

Mr. [illegible] be laid before the House an Account [illegible] from Liverpool to the different ports of War [illegible] the 1st of March last.—Ordered.

ARMY DISCIPLINE.

Sir Francis Burdett rose to submit to the House a motion that respected, in a considerable degree, the discipline of the army of this country. The subject, he said, was very important, and most materially invited and claimed the consideration of Parliament. Gentlemen had certainly entertained different sentiments respecting it; but at all events he could anticipate that any opposition would be made to the motion which he should make thereon. The Hon. Baronet then moved, "That there be laid before the House returns of the several Courts-Martial, both General and Regimental, that have taken place throughout the army for the last ten years, ending the first day of January last, specifying the number of convictions, the punishments inflicted in each regiment, and the number of lashes which each individual, punished with whipping during that period, received."—On the question being put,

The Secretary at War observed, that it was a motion of the most singular and extraodinary nature, and should meet his most decided negative. He would appeal to the reflection of the Honourable Baronet himself, whether such a motion was fit to be agitated, or such a subject was calculated to do any good, at such a crisis as the present? Besides, he did not think that it was possible to procure the papers to which the motion appeared to be directed. He observed there never was a moment in the history of this country when the necessity of discipline was so urgent as at the present crisis, when it was considered how very formidable the rival was with whom we had now to cope. It was dangerous to instil into the minds of the soldiery any sentiments that could in the most indirect way lead them to be dissatisfied with those laws and that discipline that governed them; it would have all the effect of creating alarm among them, and of making them unhappy in their profession, the consequence of which no man could foretel or foresee. He trusted that in this light the House would view it, and agree with him in the great propriety of rejecting it in limine.

Lord Castlereagh could not but think that the view which the Hon. Baronet had of the Army of this Country, and of its discipline, was very different from that of other men. Supposing the papers which he called for were before the House, still it was impossible that any parliamentary measure could be instituted upon them. It could only have a tendency of sinking into disrepute in the soldier's mind the laws by which he was governed. He appealed to the good sense of the Hon. Baronet to what he would substitute for English discipline—would he introduce a French system? If he would, he begged him to turn his eyes to the effects of that species of discipline displayed in Spain recently, where, if they did not inflict minor punishments of a corporal nature, they practised one of another description, for they shot them without form, ceremony, or trial.—In our army the most trivial punishment is not inflicted, unless the delinquent is found guilty by a court martial; so that neither the life or the safety of an individual of the humblest description was ever involved, until a Court had previously heard the case and the defence of the person accused. The Noble Lord expatiated on the superior freedom which a British soldier enjoys over all the soldiers in the world, and concluded with giving his negative to the motion.

The House then divided, against the motion, 77—for it, 4—majority, 73.

HYDE PARK.

On our return to the gallery we found Mr. Creevy on his legs, inveighing against what he termed the intended innovations upon Hyde Park, by a plan in agitation, proposed to the Lords of the Treasury by Mr. Fordyce, for building a range of houses within it on the scite where the old riding house stands, opposite Park Lane. He moved,

"That there be laid before the House Copies of the Correspondence between Mr. John Fordyce and the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, relative to granting building leases of ground in Hyde Park."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that there were no grounds for the motion. The House could not think of interfering with the Royal Prerogative, merely upon a rumour that such a plan had been submitted to the Treasury, and which he could assure the House had never yet reached his Majesty's ears.

Mr. Sheridan was at a loss to know by what authority Mr. Fordyce could assume that the Board of Treasury would countenance such an innovation. He had on this very day witnessed the encroachments made by the buildings in Hamilton-street, and he thought them a most miserable collection. It might rather be called Gibbet Place, for it abounded with gibbets of every kind. If a row of houses must be built, let them be in Rotten Row for the purpose; there the gentle equestrians in the a time when the most gloomy despondency on the of public affairs began very generally to prevail, gence suddenly arrived of a train of fortunate s, so far surpassing the most sanguine expectation, e believe some days must elapse before the public will be sufficiently calm for a proper investigation of cts. Before the arrival of the news of the past week, uses of the Patriots of Spain excited all our interest ympathy; but aware of the premeditated disposition French forces, the talents of the officers command- and the deceptive employment of the Spanish army, we scarcely dared to form a hope of their ultimate success. —We have now to congratulate our readers upon the more encouraging aspect of their affairs; upon the noble resolution they have evinced; the spirited declarations they have published; the decision of their conduct at Cadiz; in a word, of the increasing strength of their cause, and of the cause of all nations.

It is particularly worthy of observation, that hitherto the proud and ferocious NAPOLEON in his Continental warfare, has had to contend only with Cabinets and Court Factions. He has now to war with a great and honourable People, excited to the most fervid indignation by a system of fraud, hypocrisy, and insult, seldom if ever equalled in the day-light transactions of one nation with another. We hesitate not to avow, that we look back with more confidence to efforts arising out of the burning resentment of partially armed multitudes, than to the cold and often causeless operations of a more regular force, uninspired by any of those feelings which nerve the arm and sustain the heart.

Important as a happy result would be, if confined to the Peninsula of Spain only, we do not think it improbable for the contagion to spread further. It is known that several Cabinet Councils have sat upon this business, and believed that a correspondence has been opened by our Ministers with the Courts of St. Petersburgh and Vienna. The extraordinary activity of the latter, in recruiting her armies, and rendering her War Establishment respectable, has been understood with a view to extended hostilities against Turkey. Whatever may have been the original intention of the House of Austria, if it be not equally infatuated with that of Bourbon, its renovated strength may probably be employed in a war for self preservation. The mind of ALEXANDER, too, if naturally so upright as we have been led to suppose, must be strangely affected with the recent conduct of his new Ally. The diplomacy must be dexterous that can palliate his treatment of Spain.

We have still to lament the undecisive nature of the accounts from the Baltic. Both the Danish and Swedish Papers mention an attack in Malmo Roads, on the 9th ult. by the gun-boats of the former on a Swedish convoy of 80 sail, escorted by an English bomb and three armed brigs. The result was, that eleven of the merchantmen and one of the brigs were captured. There seems to be doubts entertained of the disposition of some Swedish gun-boats to share in the transaction. It is now reported that the British troops at Gottenburgh, in conjunction with some Swedish forces, will be employed on an Expedition to Holstein, to bring off the Spaniards whom the artifices of BONAPARTE have so far removed from their country. The enterprise, in the diminished state of the French force, in that quarter may be successful. It is to be wished that some employment of our force may take place at all events. At present it appears as if they could be serviceable any where but where they are.

Both Houses of Parliament met yesterday. The Lords transacted no business of importance. In the Commons Sir J. Sinclair moved, that 1500*l.* be granted to the Board of Agriculture, to enable them to make good their report of the Stock of Agriculture; and Mr. Sheridan moved an address to his Majesty, praying, that a special commission might be appointed to inspect the management of prisons in Dublin since 1798, and also to examine into the conduct of inspectors, and investigate the alledged charges of misconduct.—Carried nem. con.—After which the House was adjourned till Monday, on which day Parliament will be prorogued.

IMPORTANT INTELLIGENCE FROM SPAIN.

The following Bulletin was on Monday morning distributed in the Ministerial circles:—

"Yesterday two Gallician Deputies arrived at the Admiralty; they came from Corunna, where Captain Tremlett, of the Alcmene, landed, and was at the Sittings of the Committee. Every English prisoner, to the number of 120, was released and sent to our squadron: the greatest enthusiasm prevailed; all the troops, to the amount of 20,000 regulars and 300,000 patriotic citizens, were in full march for Madrid, to avenge their slaughtered citizens; 3000 Spanish troops in Oporto have seized the French General, and are also on their march to join their countrymen. An action took place off the port of Carthagena, between the French and a detached squadron of Lord Collingwood, when two sail of the line, several frigates and transports, having on board 8,000 French troops, intended for Carthagena, were wholly taken, sunk, or destroyed, and another French ship, which ran into that port, was seized by the armed citizens. The action took place on the 24th of May."

It is said that several Noblemen at Cadiz, among whom are Count de Torre Fresno, General Truvillo, and Baron Albalia, have fallen sacrifices to popular indignation. The army in Gallacia is said to be commanded by Generals Cuesta and Fillangrie, who had succeeded in organizing a corps of artillery and a considerable body of cavalry.

Dispatches were on Friday received at the Admiralty, and the Office of Lord Castlereagh, from Admiral Purvis and General Spencer, off Cadiz, containing the most important and pleasing intelligence, as will be seen by the following letter, sent in the course of the afternoon by Lords Castlereagh and Mulgrave to the Lord Mayor; —

"My Lord, Downing-street, July 1, 1808.

"I have the honour to acquaint your Lordship, that dispatches have been received from Major-General Spencer, dated off Cadiz the 6th ultimo, by which it appears that a negociation had been entered into between his Majesty's Naval and Military Commanders off that Port, with Deputies appointed on the part of the Provisional Government of the Province of Andalusia, assembled at Seville, the result of which had been forwarded for the approbation of the said Government.

"Every arrangement had been taken for the reduction of the French ships, and Admiral Purvis had been invited by the Spanish Commanders to anchor his fleet at the mouth of the harbour, with a view to co-operate in compelling the common enemy to surrender.

"It appears that the Southern Provinces of Spain had declared against France, and dispatches of the 4th instant, received from Lieutenant-General Sir H. Dalrymple, at Gibraltar, mention that the Spanish Army before that Fortress, reinforced by the greater part of the Garrison of Ceuta, had mutinied against the French. "I am, &c. &c.

Right Hon. Lord Mayor. "CASTLEREAGH."

"Admiralty-Office, July 1, 1808—Three o'Clock.

"My Lord,—I have the honour to acquaint your Lordship that Lieutenant Talbot of the Encounter gun-brig, has arrived at this Office, with dispatches from Rear-Admiral Purvis, dated on board his Majesty's ship Atlas, off Cadiz, at anchor off the Light-House, 6th June, 1808.

"The Rear-Admiral states, that propositions for peace had been made to him, by the Supreme Council of Seville, and that by desire of General Morla, the Commandant of Cadiz, he had brought the ships near the harbour, to be in readiness to enter, whenever a signal, as proposed by General Morla, should be displayed.

"It appears that General Morla expected every moment to receive the approbation of the High Assembly of Seville to compel the French squadron (which is stated to be securely shut up in the port of Cadiz) to surrender.

"Major-General Spencer's corps was with Rear-Admiral Purvis; and the Rear-Admiral proposed proceeding with as many ships as might be asked for, into the harbour, whenever he should be requested so to do, and furnished with pilots for that purpose. "I have the honour to be,

"My Lord,

"Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

(Signed) "MULGRAVE."

"To the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor.

"A true copy, JOHN ANSLEY, Mayor."

The following very important Letter was yesterday posted up Lloyd's:

Extract of a Letter from an Officer on board his Majesty's Resolution, dated at anchor off the Tagus, 12th of Ju Alderman Atkins.

"I have just time, by a Torbay boat with Dispatches Sir Charles Cotton, to inform you, that the Portugues Spaniards are in possession of Oporto. Admiral Purvis Cadiz, and has got possession of the French squadron. French in Lisbon, under Junot, disarmed the whole o Spanish troops in the night of the 10th instant. An ar 30,000 Spaniards is advancing towards Lisbon.

"We expect to go into the Tagus every hour. I exp come home in a Russian man of war.

"Joseph Bonaparte has been killed by the Duke De tado, who fell directly after. The Spaniards are murderi French wherever they meet them. The accounts respecti Cadiz business was brought yesterday by a Captain of Sp dragoons."

Lieutenant Talbot brought the dispatches from Admira vis to the Admiralty; and they were dated the 7th of He did not quit the fleet, in consequence of contrary win til the 8th, and he therefore brings an account of a late than that announced in Lord Castlereagh's letter. We stand, that on the arrival of the Deputies from the Assem Seville, they made a proposition to the British Command the name of the Provisional Government, to conclude a mistice, as preliminary to a Peace with Great Britain this they expressed their immediate willingness to but pointed to the French flags flying at the mast hea French men of war in the harbour, and trusted, that one Preliminaries of Peace would be the reduction of that fla the same time that they wished this to be done in the way congenial to the feelings of the Spanish Admiral. The was, that as a test of their sincerity, they would fort consent that measures should be taken jointly by the nava of both nations to put the French ships into complete emba but that they could not agree to surrender them without f instructions from the Assembly at Seville. Accordingly i resolved that the British inshore squadron, under Admi John Gore, should go in and cast anchor at the mouth harbour, alongside of the Spanish fleet, the French ships in the inner harbour, completely under the power of th teries, which were manned by Spaniards. This arrang was completed on the 7th, and on the 8th, in the mornin John Gore, with his four ships, took his station accord Pilots were coming out to carry in the rest of the ships; Lieutenant Talbot left the fleet, he heard a cannonad which, however, was soon silenced. This he took to exchange of a few shot between the Spanish batteries a French ships, as the latter, no doubt, would refuse to sur except to open force. It is added that the people we exasperated against the French for the atrocious and sang proceedings in Madrid, that the utmost address would be re to save the French seamen from their fury; but that the i keeping them as hostages for the lives of their own brave trymen, decoyed away to the North of Europe, was lik reconcile them to their preservation.

Captain Peake, of the Peacock, is arrived from Co which he left on the 20th, and our squadron off Ferrol 21st June. He brings an account (and which is confirm dispatches from Oviedo), that the Patriot Army had att the French General Dupont, who had been detached by to take a position in the Sierra Morena, to keep open th munication with Madrid. His army is said to have 25,000 men; but it probably did not exceed one-half number. The battle is said to have been sanguinary, but minated in the total route of the French, Dupont himself escaped with great difficulty. The result of which was Murat himself had thought proper to quit Madrid, and had post with his small army at the King's Villa, called Buen R a height above Madrid, where the King had a beautiful se which was perfectly open. Here, however, he was endeav to encroach himself. When the Peacock left Ferrol, the was flying for Pilots to carry our ships in, in consequenc similar convention to that which had taken place at And it further appears, that steps had been taken to knows, and, we hope, to secure to the Provisional Gover of Spain, the friendship and co-operation of South Am for which purpose, Admiral Hotham, cruizing off Ferro granted passports to a Spanish vessel carrying out intellig their several Viceroys and Governors, and inviting them faithful to the cause of their country.

Lieutenant Pringle of the cutter La Paz, is also arrived Gijon, having brought back the Secretary of the Marqu Matteroza, who sailed with the answer of our Governm pplication for succour on the 13th, and left Gijon, on his n, on the 21st. He corroborates the intelligence of the efeat of Dupont, and says that the account of it arrived e very day he left Oviedo. The Patriots had received per- ntelligence of the position of the French in the mountains, the smugglers, who are commonly known by the name of itti, and who, from their way of life, are intimately ac- ted with every accessible defile of the mountains of the a Morena. Instructed by them, who acted faithfully as s, the Patriots attacked the French with great advantage. he account at Gijon was precisely the same as at Corunna; hat the French were totally routed and dispersed—that t had, in consequence of it, left Madrid for the adjacent ts—that the Spanish troops whom he had at first secured adrid, were deserting in crouds—and that the armies of atriots were daily increasing. The only things they want hat we can supply:—provisions, cloaths, arms, and am- tion. Men they do not want, but wish that we may em- our disposable force rather as a diversion, than on the ter- y of Spain.

the Marquis of Socorro, who was also known by the name neral Solano, and who was not only Governer of Cadiz, of the whole province of Andalusia, having perished by and of popular vengeance before the transactions we have ibed occurred, no doubt is entertained. The immediate e of his death are thus related.—"When all communica- ceased between Admiral Purvis and the Governor, a Bando Proclamation) was issued, forbidding all intercourse between habitants of Cadiz and the British fleet, on pain of death. fiance, however, of this Proclamation, the intercourse con- d, and two Merchants of Cadiz were apprehended, and ed by Socorro to be executed, and the sentence was carried effect. The people instantly called for vengeance. They ed Socorro to the house of Don Pilzana, at Chiciana, a ge about three leagues from Cadiz, surrounded the house, emanded the person of Socorro. The Marquis appeared, nstantly seized, and in a few minutes was literally cut to s. His heart was exhibited as that of an infamous traitor country."

the 30th Don Morlay was appointed Commander of Cadiz. mmediately issued a most vigorous Proclamation, exciting oldiers and people of Cadiz to rise in defence of their Sove- , against the tyranny and oppression of the French. From day to the 6th of June negociations were carried on with iral Purvis and General Spencer. Two Deputies were sent the Admiral, who immediately sent Captain Sir J. Gore, Colonel Sir George Smith, into Cadiz, where they were ved with the utmost respect and civility by the Authorities, with the greatest enthusiasm by the people. Negociations then set on foot, for a joint co-operation between the force diz and the British fleet against the French squadron; and, e 5th, the Articles which our Commanders had agreed up- ere sent to be approved by the General Junta of the Pro- e of Andalusia, at Saville. e accounts from Madrid state, that the foreign soldiers in French army are in a state of mutiny against the French, and the desertions to the Spaniards are numerous. The deser- of 1200 at Zamor, is confirmed. It appears that the Pa- s have arms, ammunition, and money enough to last for time. There has been an advance made by the merchants Gibraltar, to assist General Castano's army to a consider- amount.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday, at two o'clock, his Majesty held a Private Levee at the Queen's Palace. After which his Majesty held a Privy Council, and gave audiences to the Cabinet Ministers.

The public will shudder to hear that some monster, in the shape of a human being, has had the audacity to fire a gun or pistol across the horses in the carriage of the amiable and innocent Princess Charlotte of Wales. It would be difficult to devise the motives of the perpetrator. A very serious investigation of the fact took place on Friday. We lament to say that no discovery has yet been made; we trust that no effort will be left untried to discover the miscreant.

The modest diffidence lately shewn in St. Stephen's Chapel, respecting who gave orders for the expenditure in reforming the outside of that sacred fane, reminds us of Macbeth and Banquo's Ghost;

"Shake not thy gory locks at me, thou can'st not say, I did it."

The humourous Dean Swift, whose antipathy to fishing was well known, having been asked, by a little child, what a fishing rod meant—"it means, my dear," said he, "only a long pole, with a fool at one end, and a worm at the other."

When Napoleon talks to the Pope of a resumption of right, his Holiness seems disposed to consider it rather as a presumption of right;

"Strange that such difference should be,
'Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee."

In the course of his electioneering canvass, the late lamented Charles James Fox was compelled to meet many unpleasant interruptions. On one occasion, soliciting an elector of opposite principles to himself for his vote, the Gentleman, certainly with more candour than politeness, instantly and bluntly declared, he would sooner give him an halter—that, my dear sir, said Fox, I would not deprive you of, as I have no doubt it is a family piece.

FASHIONS FOR JULY,

Extracted from the Twenty-fourth Number of LE BEAU MONDE, OR, LITERARY AND FASHIONABLE MAGAZINE.

LADIES' DRESSES.

HALF FULL DRESS.—A plain simple dress of Indian muslin, with an elegant vandyked trimming of lace round the bottom and sleeves, with a footing inserted above of the richest point lace. The dress is made of walking length, moderately long in the waist, with a full frock back, the front square with a mitreing of point inserted round the bosom. The sleeves are longer than formerly, made full, and gathered into a footing of point lace, to correspond with the bottom of the dress. The capuchin cloak is of skyblue sarsnet, edged with a rich footing of point lace, or of the new invented floss silk trimming. The Tyrolese cap is composed of white satin, lace, pearls, and gold net, with variegated tassels of gold and silver bullion, and twist intermixed. Gloves are white, and the shoes of light blue to match the cloak. Ear-rings, large gold hoops.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ON LADIES' DRESSES FOR JULY.

From the arrangements of the season, the half dress is nearly as rich in lace and ornament, as the full dress of the winter evenings. This naturally arises from the fashionable world being now on the wing for the different watering places, and other usual summer resorts, where the bustle of walking and sailing parties, and all the enjousments of the Steyne, the Pantiles, or the Marine Parade, leave little time to the elegante to vary her embellishments in her rapid transitions from the social dinner-party to the library, from thence to the evening ramble, until she concludes the amusements of the day, mingling in the mazes of the dance, or yielding all her soul to harmony in the concert room. As the use of dress is certainly not only to cover but to display the form, the present modes seem completely in point, and in strict classic resemblance of the ancient costume; thus we see that the Palmatia Tunica has been adopted, and in many instances the purple zone displays the symmetra of the form, and gives additional grace to the fashionable elongation of the waist. The modern rage for studying the productions of the old masters, has inspired a considerable portion of taste in the votaries of fashion, as here they see all the elegance of the Italian school, founded upon a judicious imitation of the antique; added to this, there are some attempts to introduce the interesting embellishments of the earlier times of our own country, therefore we have the Queen Mary cap, and the Anna Bullen bonnet, and some of our fashionable wanderers have even adapted the Pilgrim hat, and cockle shell. In these days of gallantry, where then is the beau who would not gladly join in a pilgrimage with such companions, were it to Palestine itself?

GENTLEMEN'S DRESSES.

Fig. No. 1.—A grass-green coat with covered or metal buttons: white dimity waistcoat; Nankin trowsers and stockings: shoes with strings. Single-breasted coats are by far the most proper and gentlemanly, although many continue to be lappelled. Light pepper and salt mixtures, or a sort of horseback mixture, with plain plated, or plated basket buttons, are equally fashionable: striped quilting waitcoats, single-breasted; and white corduroy breeches are worn with these coats.

For Evening Dress—Nothing is so prevalent as dark blues and forest greens, double-breasted, with flat full size gilt buttons, and either black velvet collars or collars of the same cloth, according to the fancy of the wearer; white Marseilles quilting waistcoats, single-breasted, are almost exclusively worn; Indian Nankin, or very light coloured kerseymere breeches, with covered buttons and silk strings.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

On Saturday se'nnight, intelligence was received at the East India House, of the safe arrival of the undermeptioned ships off Plymouth, on the 24th inst. under convoy of his Majesty's ships St. Alban's, viz.:—

True Briton, Capt. Clark; Britannia, Capt. Birch; Nottingham, Capt. Campbell; Scaleby Castle, Capt. Lock; Henry Addington, Capt. Kerkpatrick; Cumberland, Capt. Farrer; Cuffnells, Capt. Wellbank; Retreat, Capt. Hay.

Sailed from China the 11th of January, and left St. Helena the 30th of April, but did not touch at Prince of Wales's Island. Off the Straits of Molacca, they were attacked by the Piedmontese, French frigate, but after a few shots she sheered off.

The direct ships to China (except the Surat Castle), Taunton Castle, Hope, Woodford, Earl Camden, and Coutts, arrived at Canton on the 28th December, all well.

THE THEATRES.

COVENT-GARDEN.

This Theatre closed for the season, on Monday, the 27th of June, with the tragedy of Macbeth, and a farce called The Portrait of Cervantes, which had been once performed for the benefit of Mr. Munden. Of this farce, altered from the French, it is unnecessary for us to speak, because another piece, taken from the same original, and much better managed, made its appearance at the Haymarket in the course of the last week, and will presently come under our observation. The part of Macbeth, which is not perhaps among the most excellent of Mr. Kemble's performances, was represented by him, on this concluding night, in a more animated and poetical manner than we ever saw it performed by him. But an unfortunate lameness, for which an apology was made, prevented him from displaying his powers to full advantage; if by this lameness the allusion of the scene was destroyed for the mass of the spectators; however amply the beauties of the performance might be felt by a discerning few, who estimate the art as an exhibition rather of mind than of body, and can tell from what they see existing, how much more would exist if nature did but permit. Miss Smith, in the absence of Mrs. Siddons from the stage, played Lady Macbeth, and played it with great applause.

Between the play and the farce, Mr. Kemble delivered a farewell address, which had, at least, the merit of being short and unaffected. In this address, he returned the thanks of the Proprietors and Performers for the past, and promised their unremitting exertions for the future.

On the general management of this Theatre, we spoke so largely in our last number, that it must be tiresome to our readers for us now to discuss that matter. Till the next season, therefore, we reserve the further remarks that we must make upon the government of Mr. Harris, the sovereign of the theatre, upon the shameful misconduct into which he is so frequently led by his sycophant ministers; and upon that "power behind the throne," which is "greater than the throne itself."

HAYMARKET.

Although it be a maxim by no means unfounded, that t racter of a civilized nation is in great measure to be es by its dramatic exhibitions, yet it is a maxim by no mea versal in its application, nor proper to be believed in its sense. The persons of the drama perhaps afford some the character of the nation: but the construction of th and the spirit of the dialogue, do not by any means bea disposition of the country in which they appear, the so lation one would be inclined to expect. Thus, althou natures of the men and women (of course a little hei by scenic effect), are drawn from the ordinary perso real life existing in the respective countries, yet the fa the dialogue are frequently formed upon principles tot reign from the taste of the people before whom the pl acted. Thus the English, who are supposed always to in that which is most solid, and to be surpassed by their bours in things superficial, have not, for the most part, led in the construction of the fable, which is the most so of a comedy: but they have comic authors, whose dial of the brightest and most continual wit. The French, wh position inclines them to lighter things, have been wond successful in forming the closely-knit fabrics of their fabl have been greatly exceeded by the English in the constru dialogue, which in France is not at all beyond the exte neous capacity of ordinary speakers, but which, in some best English comedies, is almost an uninterrupted blaze Not that we wish to encourage that unnatural aptness a good things, which is so perpetually obtruding itself in the some of our great wits; but we think the dialogue of a play be something, which if it never did actually pass in real soci might without utter improbability have passed. We ca no objection to see wits witty; but we are not delighte we find footmen and chambermaids as intellectual as thei ters and mistresses.

Allowing then, as we do allow, the superiority of the over the English authors in the invention of droll situatio must approve, rather than join our cotemporaries in co ing the modern practice of adapting French pieces to th lish stage, particularly pieces of mere farce. And amon adaptations none has been more happy than the piece, from the French comedy Le Portrait de Michel Cervan Mr. Charles Kemble, and acted for the first time on Th evening, at the Haymarket. The French original is in acts: Mr. Charles Kemble has compressed it into two, a duced it to an afterpiece, entitled Plot and Counterplot, Portrait of Michael Cervantes.

The fable is composed of the contrivances of two rivals scheme against each other in order to gain possession of a lady, the daughter of an eminent painter. Having learn he has a design of painting the portrait of Cervantes, fro dead body of that great author, then lying in a neighb church, they employ their information in a manner produc infinite drollery. We will not describe to our Reade mode in which these ingenious intrigues are conducted; b we are unwilling to diminish the pleasure which they must receive in beholding the piece itself. We shall only say Leon, the more estimable of the two lovers, is ultimatel cessful, and marries the lady.

In that kind of bold broad humour, which cons the very spirit of farce, this afterpiece is probably with superior. It was received throughout with roars of la and bursts of applause.

Some share of the praise which this performance so l obtained, was due to the admirable acting of Mr. Listo Mr. Fawcett; whose whimsical and original conceits perpe drew forth the most genuine of all applause, the hearty of boxes, pit, and gallery. Mrs. Gibbs too acted with spirit, and deserves much commendation. Mr. Putnam indisposed, Mr. Charles Kemble represented the charac Fernando, the more active, but less fortunate of the two l

LAW REPORT.

SENTENCE OF THE PROPRIETOR AND PRINTER OF INDEPENDENT WIG.

The Attorney-General moved the judgment of the Cou the Defendants, the Proprietor and Printer of the Indepe Whig Newspaper, who stood convicted of printing and pub ing two libels, the one on Sir Simon Le Blanc, which tend bring into contempt the administration of justice, and to in abhorrence the verdict of Juries, and the other on Lord al affidavits were read in Court in behalf of the Defend- For Mr. White it was stated in the affidavits of Surgeon n, and Messrs. Miller and Adams, that he was a man a length of time had been afflicted with ill health, and ffinement in a prison would endanger his life. He was at is afflicted with a fever, besides a liver complaint, and it essary that he should take exercise and enjoy good air. espect to the publication of the libels it was alledged in ion of punishment that The Independent Whig was ap- ted for general and free discussion, without the prejudice y or opinion. The Deponent White was not the au- the publications complained of, nor was he privy to the ition. The authors, such as were known had consented that the deponent White might not suffer, to their be- ared in Court; and the letter signed Junius, addressed imon Le Blanc, on the subject of the trials of Bennet and an for alledged murders, were written by Mr. Gale Jones, hecary at Islington, and another of the faulty publica- s from the pen of Mr. Miles, author of the Letter to the of Wales.

Attorney-General produced the Whig newspapers since viction of the Defendants, in order to prove that no con- whatever had been made, but on the contrary the third who tried the cause against the Defendants had been li- and the spirit of libelling had been kept up on each day ication. The newspapers of the 5th, 12th, 19th and 26th ere produced and in part read. It appeared by them that llenborough was treated very rashly, and his judicial illiberally contrasted. The writings in these publica- ere as strong, as the libels of which the Defendants were ed.

Clifford briefly addressed the Bench in mitigation of pu- t. He stated that the defendants had given up the au- the libels, which were known, and the other writings ned of were anonymous. He trusted that their Lord- ould act leniently as they had done with the proprietor blication who was recently convicted of a libel, but who, g up the author, was not called up for judgment."

ttorney-General replied in a nervous speech, in which he d on the several libels, which he conceived of the most ous and malicious kind, inasmuch as they were intended the laws of the country into contempt, and to incite the to acts of violence. One of the libels imputed to the gistrate that he was unworthy the seat he filled, and con- is conduct with the vile Judge Jefferies in the reign of he Second, who was torn from the Bench by the indig- pulace. If words were to be taken in their ordinary ce, the populace were incited to act in the same to the worthy and intelligent Chief Justice as they e to Jefferies; Lord Ellenborough had also been sely and maliciously accused of having given his vote er inimical to the good of his country. The his- the day demonstrated how cowardly the bold and acted when the moment arrived for their conduct to be l. The defendants had eagerly grasped at every sub- o palliate their conduct, after they had failed to intimi- their insolence. Guilt and falsehood erected bold fronts rial, and the defendants had not scrupled to advance t falsehoods, to cover their intolerable insolence. The ts were not forsaken by their bold effrontery after con- but they supposed that even then by persevering in the e of intimidation, under pretence of bringing the Judge who tried them into contempt, they would be suffered e with impunity. It had been stated in the Whig since iction of the Defendants, that an appeal would be made Houses of Parliament against the Judge who tried them rtiality. The Learned Counsel concluded with some s on what he called this bold audacity, and he trusted Bench would give such a punishment, as would stop of general libelling in future.

. Parke and Richards followed on the same side.

Grose, after reading over the stronger passages in the Libels, addressed the Defendants previously to passing . He conceived the Libels to be of the very worst on, and tending to overthrow all civil society, and such were the greatest enemies to what was so much talked Liberty of the Press. The Libels went to state that corruption should be exposed, and by this the conduct mon Le Blanc was called in question, for the purpose of falsely accusing him, and in language the most abominable, with having advised the acquittal of Chapman. Yet it was stated that the author was not in Court, although he was bold enough to call the summing up of the Judge, and the verdict of the Jury in question. The author had dared to stigmatize the Judge for leaving the Jury to decide on the credibility of the witnesses, and also that Jury for delivering a conscientious verdict according to evidence. The Learned Judge dwelt on the enormity of the Libels with considerable force; they were evidently maliciously intended to defame, vilify the Judges and the law, and to corrupt and excite discord in the minds of men.

The Defendants were sentenced to be imprisoned eighteen calender months each for the libel on Sir Simon Le Blanc and the Jury, and eighteen months each for the libel on Lord Ellenborough—White in the county gaol at Dorchester, and Hart in the county gaol of Gloucester,—and at the expiration of the three years to find sureties to keep the peace for five years, themselves in 500*l.* and two sureties in 250*l.* each, and to remain in prison until such sureties be found.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

The Baltic Convoy has been stopped at the Nore, in order to wait for several gun-boats which are ordered to accompany it. These gun-boats are felt to be extremely necessary in the Baltic particularly, in consequence of the mode of attack adopted by the Danes. Their employment is therefore grateful to the merchants interested in the trade of that sea.

LAUNCH OF THE CALEDONIA.—On Saturday se'nnight, at a quarter past five o'clock, the Caledonia, of 120 guns, was launched from the Dock-yard of Plymouth, in presence of at least 60,000 spectators from all parts of England; some we understand, came from Scotland to witness the interesting spectacle. The vessel glided into the bosom of the deep in a gentle and majestic manner, amid the repeated plaudits of the multitude, and the firing of guns from the shipping. The standard of England proudly waved at her main; the Admiralty and Union flags at her fore and mizen. Few sights could be more interesting; a body of such vast magnitude in motion could not fail to create interest.

For the gratifications of our readers we insert the dimensions of the Caledonia. She was designed by Sir W. Rule, and was laid down in 1804, on the slip from which the Hiberuia was then launched.

DIMENSIONS.	Ft.	In.
Extreme length from the figure head to the stern rail	246	0
Length on the gun-deck	205	0
Extreme breadth	53	6
Depth in the hold	23	2
Burthen	2602 tons.

On the lower deck she has 17 ports on each side, middle deck 18, upper deck 17, quarter deck 6, and forecastle 2. She will mount 120 guns, from 18 to 32 pounders, besides carronades. Her stern is light and undecorated; the Unicorn supporting the Arms of Scotland is the only design. Her head is a bust of a female figure, with the plaid bonnet, thistle, and bagpipes of Caledonia, carved on each side. Her main mast is 119 feet in length, and 39 inches in diameter; the weight of her anchor is nearly 9400 pounds.

On Thursday evening a respectable tradesman in the neighbourhood of Grosvenor-square, who has been confined through illness for a considerable length of time, got up, went to the window, and lifted up the sash—whether by accident or design is not yet ascertained; but he fell down upon the spikes round the area, and hung by his thigh for some time upon the spikes; he then fell upon the pavement. Upon the whole, he is so dreadfully wounded, that it is doubtful whether he may live until the melancholy tale is perused by our readers.

DIED.

Near Milltown, in Derriaghy, Ireland, Mary Delap, aged 106 years. She retained all her faculties till within a few days of her death, her sight excepted, which she lost about six years ago.

On the 4th ultimo, at Cluncullen, near Kilternan, Dublin, aged 109 years 3 months and 17 days, Valentine Walsh, farmer. This venerable patriarch enjoyed a perfect state of health until a few days of his death, was a keen sportsman, and a constant companion, of the famous Johnny Adair, of Kilternan; he was a jolly companion, much attached to his native whiskey, of which he drank regularly two quarts every day in grog, until a week before his death. His funeral was attended by above 500 persons from the neighbouring villages.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER TWENTY-EIGHT.

XAMINATION OF THE LAST SESSION OF PARLIAMENT.

Monday closed the Second Session of the Fifth Par- of Great Britain and Ireland, with the usual Speech he Throne.

ef recapitulation of the business of the Session, with casional remarks as may tend to convey an adequate ion of the principal subjects which have occupied ention of Parliament during its sitting, may not be ome to the readers of The National Register.

uestion more calculated for popular declamation tematic debate than the merits of the Expedition to agen, has seldom been discussed by the Legislative lies of this land. Much investigation and eloquence cordingly been employed on the topic:—One party ended it as a measure of the most urgent necessity, he other has described it as a deed which no state of tances could justify. Without embracing the lat- ion to the extent, we cannot help thinking the es of its necessity have displayed more ingenuity oof. Upon ourselves, the strictures made in the f Peers by Lord Hutchinson (see No. 7, of The l Register) made an impression with respect to the ncy of this act of vigour, which no subsequent ar- has been able to remove. Should a time arrive he greatest Power of the North may be inspired oubts of the policy of his alliance with France, the greatest obstacle to his complete conversion found in the conduct of Great Britain to Denmark.

next subject of importance which strongly divided iments of the Legislature, was the propriety and ence of the Orders in Council. Opinions on this have been as various and contradictory out of the s within. That it bore an aspect of promise to t India Proprietors, cannot be doubted, but that prove exceedingly injurious to the British Manu- was equally evident. Sometime has now elapsed hear nothing of the effect. We confess we cannot an infringement of all the acknowledged rights of ty for a nugatory or doubtful object. That this pplication of our maritime superiority was a politic essary retaliation on France, for the violence of ees with respect to the British commerce, we can- w. Indeed, we are somewhat indignant when we s and similar measures defended, by maintaining sity of fighting France with her own weapons. The ground of warfare assumed by this country was infi- ore lofty. What it may become by a professed of the violence of a nation, which has neither com- or commercial relations to preserve or acquire, we attempt to decide. How far these regulations have to interrupt our intercourse with America, has not determined, or whether they had any share in pro- he precautionary plan of the embargo or not. The s of Great Britain America, it must be confessed, are at present most curiously circumstanced. It is obviously the interest of both, to avoid war, if possible, and the ruling statesmen of each feel that it is so, yet with these convictions fully operating on their minds, and on the minds of the cooler part of the public in both states, a coolness and distrust prevail, from which the common enemy derives nearly as much advantage, as could accrue to him from decided hostilities. We say common enemy, for let France succeed in her designs upon Spain, and we shall soon hear her assume another tone to America.

The question of Peace was again argued this Sessions in a debate, caused by the submission of some strong Resolutions by Mr. Whitbread, expressive of the disapprobation of the House at the refusal of the Russian Mediation. In a very comprehensive and able speech, the Honourable Mover detailed all the circumstances internal and external which should incline the country to listen to Negociation. As this subject was particularly treated of by us at the time, it is unnecessary again to enter into the merits of the discussion. The Resolutions were of course rejected by a large majority. Whatever might be the propriety of this particular decision, it is deeply to be lamented that there is a numerous and powerful body of people in this country so enamoured with or interested in War, that the mention of Peace at any time or in any form never fails to excite their incessant clamour, accompanied by every symptom of horror and aversion.

For the Military Defence of the Country we are obliged to observe, that little has been done by Parliament during the Session we are describing. We by no means intend to occupy ourselves with any further revision of the plans (as pompously stiled) of Mr. Windham and Lord Castlereagh. All the alteration which the former effected in the mode of Recruiting (to which part of the Army System his attention appears to have been solely confined) the latter has rescinded. This between the parties may be a great object, but we steadily maintain that these capricious variations in the manner of raising men, which the majority sanctions with such infinite sang froid, are productive of considerable mischief among the soldiery. The Noble Secretary's scheme of a Local Militia, putting the pernicious principle of Ballot out of the question, is miserably deficient when considered as a Plan of National Defence. It will raise a comparatively small number of men, indeed, to be employed on a particular emergency, but will it rouse that honourable feeling in the effective population of this country, which the spirit of the times require? Again we cannot help recommending Lord Selkirk's excellent Pamphlet on this subject to the attention of our Readers.

We are sorry that it is not in our power to congratulate the Public on any particular advantages which have yet accrued from the labours of the Finance Committee. The fate of the Bill for preventing the Grant of Reversions by the Crown has rather checked the aspiring hopes of the good kind of people, who were sanguine in their expectation of effectual reform through this medium. For our own part, whatever little disappointment we may have experienced we have been highly amused by the whole of the transaction. Who indeed could contemplate without a smile, the disinterested opposition of parties holding large Reversions themselves—the calm support of certain of the Ministers—the dignified interference of the Princes of the Blood—the amiable pliability of Mr. Banks—and last, not least, an unanimous Address from the Common Councilmen of London.

We have lately entered so elaborately into the subject of Catholic Emancipation, that nothing remains for us here, but to notice the unusual circumstances which attended the Debate in the House of Commons. Never was a question, as to argument, carried more triumphantly. The total absence of all force in the replies of Administration, would countenance the idea of their division on this subject, did not the pertinacity with which they have carried several minor points against the Catholics, too clearly shew the absence of any friend to their cause in the Cabinet. We allude to the curtailment of the Maynooth grant, the appointment of Dr. Duigenan to the Privy Council, the patronage of Gifford, &c. As no plea of necessity could be urged for this conduct, we presume the Anti-Catholic part of the Administration meet with little opposition from the well-bred indifference of their Colleagues. In the House of Lords the minority in favour of the Catholic Claims were very respectable, both in number and weight. The speech of one of them (the Bishop of Norwich) produced a considerable sensation.

The Carnatic and other Questions, relative to the conduct of Lord Wellesley, in India, have at length been got rid of—and as far as such a disposal of the facts will answer the purpose, his Lordship's character has been finally whitewashed. Of the policy of this Nobleman's conduct in India, much doubt may be entertained, but we cannot see the utility of bringing it before the country at this period. The business has now, however, dropped, whether by its own weight or the want of talent to support it we do not decide. It is a pity the Hon. Baronet who last interested himself in these enquiries, had not been aware of the approaching change of Administration, before he called the attention of the House to the subject.

In consequence of a statement in the public Papers, that his Majesty had given the Duke of York 20,000*l.* out of the Droits of the Admiralty and Crown, a motion was made by Sir Francis Burdett for an account of the amount and appropriation of the funds in question. With some modifications the motion was agreed to. Setting aside the case of Sir Home Popham, it certainly requires to be considered how far it is eligible for such enormous forfeitures to become individual property. A Charles II. in want of money, might make terrible use of the privilege of seizing prizes before the declaration of war.

The Finance Business of the Sessions has been conducted with tolerable ability in the way of Loan, and with respect to Impost, if the regulation, or in other words the increase of the Assessed Taxes and Stamp Duties, do not give general satisfaction, we fear few could be substituted that would be more successful. The Annuity Plan we consider highly objectionable.

The measure of stopping the Distillation from Corn to aid the consumption of West India Produce has been argued in the House of Commons, with all the zeal which a sense of personal interest can inspire, and probably with more pertinacity than the point required. We deem it more likely to injure as a case of precedent than of fact.

Under the head of Domestic Regulation we have to notice Lord Ellenborough's Bill for the relief of small Debtors, and that of Sir Samuel Romilly for a better classification of crimes and punishments as entitled to considerable praise. We wish we could say as much of the Indictment Bill.—Our Readers already know our opinions on that subject.—The rejection by the House of Lords of the Stipendiary Curates' Bill in its garbled state cannot be deemed of much consequence.

The union of all parties and opinions on the National Conduct to be adopted towards Spain has given a peculiar termination to the Sessions, and of course forms cipal feature of the Speech which concludes fervently we hope the Speech destined to open may have to dwell on the success which has atte united efforts of Spanish patriotism and British co Ver ever obligations (in common with his countrymen an in general) he may in future be under to that nobly people, he cannot but be angry at their rising as were, to give him the lie. Scarcely a proposition Spanish conduct, which has not been contradicted b intelligence, and that so opportunely, that it seemed the regular process of cause and effect, for the affirmati Cobbett to produce the negative of Spain.

In The Weekly Register of the 11th of June, with t dogmatism, so peculiarly his own, he pronounces the tion, effected by Bonaparte in that country, to be so c a matter of course, that few topics for observation co on the subject. So convinced, indeed, is he of the a indifference of the public mind in Spain, he becomes at the application of the word People to its native "people of Spain, indeed!" exclaims he in his mos manner, "There was no such thing as a people in Spa "were some millions of people walking about on "each; but they were in a political point of view "than so many head of cattle. or the Prince. "The moment they were gone, the ople appear to have felt a return of their ancient ar-acter." Dreadfully hazardous would be the profes- of politics, if the profits of a writer depended in any e on the sagacity of his predictions. Scarcely had the r of the Political Register taught his clients how to account he unexpected opposition of the Spaniards, ere it was tained that, perfectly regardless of his present opinions, were actuated by similar sentiments and feelings to those he ssed to entertain some half dozen years ago. That instead ng indifferent to the treatment and captivity of their rulers, or four thousand of them were slain in a fruitless attempt event the departure of the last of the family who remained drid. It also appears from all accounts that the standard rdinand is that of the People, who seem by no means de- d at the prospect of being delivered from their native go- rs and ancient laws. Nay, their very enslaver, to induce to acquiese in the loss of the first, thinks it necessary to pany his promise of a better administration with a solemn e that the latter shall be inviolably preserved.

dest men might imagine that a writer, whose positions on ject of so much importance had proved uniformly erroneous, l be led into some explanation or acknowledgment of his ; very different is the conduct of Mr. Cobbett, he knows eaders and the world better. Fortunately for him, a ru- prevailed that the Queen of Spain had declared her eldest be illigitimate; what an excellent tub for the whale. , queens, and bastards, male and female, overwhelm the Spanish Patriots, who appear to great disadvantage at tter end of an article so interesting. By the bye Mr. Cob- nakes some allusions here upon which comment would be s and mirth out of place. Indignation and contempt are due to that man, who, to gratify the vulgar and indis- nate appetite for scandal, which he finds so profitable, tes not unnecessarily and causelessly to alarm the fears and of honor—to shock the moral feelings and honest pre- es of half the nation.

should have little more to say of Mr. Cobbett and his mentary on the Motives of National Resistance, were we nvinced that so much of his opinion as tended to under- he energies of the Spanish people has been very general. st be allowed that the British are too much inclined to the chief of what is valuable confined to themselves. Spaniards cannot boast either of the Freedom of the Press, rial by Jury, the Habeas Corpus Act, or of Works like Weekly Register.—They are also (and excessively lament- t is to Mr. Perceval) superstitious Roman Catholics. How possible for such a Nation to value either Government or ry. Shallow and unphilosophical quere! as if a people had existed independently for many centuries, who have e proverbial for dignity of sentiment, and individual in- y of character could be wholly destitute of those high and feelings which kindle at the idea of foreign interference, national dishonour. Such a population might indeed be into an incapability of resistance; but to suppose it could feel indifferent is to degrade human nature much more it deserves. How miserable would be the state of nine- of the communities on earth, if society were so loosely cted as Mr. Cobbett, and writers like Mr. Cobbett, would m imagine. Happy is it for mankind that they are bound ner by ties so intimate and so strong by an associating prin- so irresistible and fervent, that neither faults in Governors effects in Government can lessen their hatred of foreign nation, or extinguish the early habits, sympathies, and pre- es which form their national identity—and give colouring ignificance to the phrase 'Our native land.'

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH AND GOTTENBURGH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

RIS, JUNE 21.—The following official documents, con- g the Spanish Junta, have now been published:—

GENERAL JUNTA.—FIRST SITTING.

the 15th of June, in the current year, 1808, at noon, the Assembly of the Spanish Junta was held in the City of ne, in the Bishop's Palace, where a hall had been pre- for that purpose, under the presidency of his Excellency Miguel Josse d'Azanze, Councillor of State, Minister of Finances, and Secretary of the Junta; his Excellency the ellier d'Uargajo, Honorary Councillor of State; and Don lo Romanillos, Member of the Council of Finances, and tary of the King.

"This day, the following Royal Order and Decree was read in full Council, addressed to the Dean of the Council:—

"HIGH AND WORTHY SIR,

"By the following Decree which has been presented to the Supreme Junta of the Government, by his Imperial and Royal Highness the Grand Duke of Berg, Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom, his Majesty the Emperor of the French, &c. has deemed it good to proclaim his Serene Brother Joseph Napoleon, now King of Naples and Sicily, King of Spain and the Indies. I, by the command of his Highness, and subsequent resolution of the Junta, do present it to your Worship, in order that the same may without delay be put into circulation and executed.

"The Council will see in this Resolution of his Imperial Majesty, the wisdom of his foresight, and the most obvious proof of his beneficent intentions towards the Spanish nation.

"To proclaim him King is to say what is expected from his paternal cares; and to place his Illustrious Brother on the throne of Spain is to unite for ever the interest and glory of France with the interest and glory of Spain.

"His Imperial Highness, together with the Junta, who so well knew that among the qualities which especially occasioned the election of this Sovereign, his love of justice and beneficence are to be enumerated, and their hope that all those benefits which he has in his Proclamation promised will soon take effect, together with all those others which his Majesty has doubtless reserved to himself, to announce to his people when he appears in his metropolis.

"In the Palace, 11th June, 1808.

(Signed) "SEBASTIANO DE PINUELLA.

"To the Dean of the Council."

[Here follows the Imperial Decree, proclaiming Joseph King of Spain and the Indies.]

His Excellency M. d'Azanza, President of the Junta, delivered the following speech:

"GENTLEMEN—It is a most pleasing and honourable task to contribute to the felicity of one's country, and to labour for the welfare of the present race, and of posterity. Such is in fact the great object which unites us in this venerable assembly, called together by the command, and under the eye, of the hero of our age, the invincible Napoleon, Emperor of the French, and King of Italy. Thanks and immortal fame to the extraordinary man who gives us again a country which we had lost! Since many centuries we have been altogether removed from the government, which has been entrusted at one time to artful men, who had no other object than with dexterity to oppress the people; at another time to weak sovereigns without character, who, devoting themselves to their pleasures, abandoned the government to their favourites. See! it is thus that the Spanish nation has been sinking from the summit of its glory, to which it had raised itself in the 15th and 16th centuries, to the abyss in which it was plunged, when the last of our Kings resigned the right of Government to a Prince, who, for our happiness, unites in himself all the qualities requisite to give life to the nation, in the critical state in which it was entrusted to him. The first use which he made of his new power was to impart it to his Illustrious Brother Joseph Napoleon, a just and beneficent Prince, who, raised before to the throne of Naples, had already proved indisputably, that his Government was paternal, and had no other object than the welfare of those who were happy enough to live under his laws. He has resolved, that in the place where he resides, and even in his presence, the Deputies of the principal towns, and the other authorities of our country, should assemble, in order to confer on the evils under which we have lived, and to confirm the constitution which our restorer himself will present to us, in order that it may be the inviolable rule of our government. This is the noble and glorious end for which we are assembled here. It is therefore necessary that we should apply our whole attention, and, laying aside all party spirit, and all the prejudices of provinces, classes, and ranks, devote all our energies to the common welfare of Spain. No one can now have an interest distinct from that of his country. The members of the same family must alike enjoy the common benefit, and alike contribute to the respective charge of supporting the common splendour. In the eye of the law, they who are less favoured by fortune lose none of the respect they merit, nor of their right to be protected. Let every one of us, as far as himself is concerned, sacrifice the benefit we exclusively enjoy, and of which many are imaginary. Let us offer them upon the altar of our country, in order to raise a simple and great monument, in the place of the Gothic and tottering structure of our former Government. Let us examine it well, and we shall find that it is the constitution which best fits the whole of our country, upon which our attention must be fixed, and by no means on what alone is to the advantage of particular classes.

"United here, Gentlemen, each of us apart may do much to appease the ferment and disorder which disquiet various towns of the kingdom. Our remonstrances may make them perceive the misery into which they are plunged by the seduction of selfish men, and warnings may force out of their hands weapons which can alone injure themselves. What do these men imagine? Do they think that they can restore the Princes of the old dynasty to the throne? What means have they to contend against a power which the greatest empires have not been able to resist? The illusion of some is risen to so great a height, that in order to fix their election upon the House of Austria, they have determined that the Archduke Charles shall be King of Spain. Ah! what can the House of Austria do for us? Can they rely upon such distant support, and upon such slow aid?

"Nevertheless they act without plan, concord, or object. What must be the result? The ruin and desolation of the country. As to ourselves, we are convinced of the truth, but it is necessary to proclaim it to those who are in error. It is thus that our labours may be of service, and that we may execute the noble purposes of the hero who has called us together. If we do not lose sight of the enlightened principles which I have slightly mentioned, there is no doubt that Spain will enjoy her former splendour, and it will be joyful then to think that we have contributed to it."

After having heard the Address of M. d'Azanza, the Junta resolved that they would, in a body, testify their allegiance and homage to his Majesty the King of Spain, and present a suitable address to him, the adoption of which should take place in the present sitting.—(Moniteur, June 22.)

JUNE 23.—On the 17th inst. the Spanish Junta at Bayonne held their second sitting. On the 18th, they were admitted in a body to an audience to his Majesty King Joseph. His Excellency Don M. J. d'Azanza delivered the following Address:

"SIRE!—All the world knows for what momentous purpose we have been summoned into this city by your illustrious brother the invincible Napoleon, Emperor of the French, and King of Italy. To lay the foundations of the permanent felicity of our dear country is the glorious task imposed upon us. It is not our duty to testify first to our King, the Chief of the Spanish nation, and the centre of all hope, the becoming zeal and the unwearied earnestness with which, under the present memorable circumstances, we shall devote ourselves to the office with which we are charged? We are, Sire, deeply afflicted at the divisions and momentary disturbances which are shaking some of our provinces—disturbances which have been occasioned by the errors of the people, who did not think, and who will merit your pity when they return from their errors. We have done, Sire, and shall do all that depends upon ourselves, in order to bring back peace and good order, for that which is of the highest moment is, that no hindrance arise in the way of the beneficent projects of the incomparable hero who will imprint his immortal name on the grateful hearts of our latest posterity. We are, Sire, to concur in these projects, and we are to support your Majesty with the integrity, the fidelity, the self-devotion which certainly constitute duties the most precious to our heart, since your Majesty has announced the glorious resolution to govern only for the happiness of Spaniards; a resolution worthy the Monarch whose fame is spread over the universe as a model of gentleness and virtue, who constituted the delight of the people he governed, and whom he left in tears because he went to bear away his virtues into another land. Such, Sire, are the feelings which animate us, and which we now come in a body to testify at the feet of your Majesty."

To this his Majesty gave the following answer:

"GENTLEMEN, DEPUTIES OF THE JUNTA,

"I share in your sentiments and in your hopes. The so clearly announced will of his Majesty the Emperor of the French, our illustrious brother, in favour of the prosperity of Spain, is sufficiently guaranteed by his glory. The co-operation of your zeal and your resources, will easily subdue the obstacles which private interest may lay in the way of the whole nation: being founded in error, they shall be expelled by truth. As to ourselves, we wish not to know those errors. Beyond the Pyrenees we will find none but Spanish hearts. In leaving a people who rendered justice to our Government, we have made the severest of all sacrifices; but the love of that people is a prognostic of that of the Spaniards: shall we do less for the great nation which Providence has entrusted to our care? Will they be less [illegible] know the full import of Castilian faith; [illegible] ties; we shall bring the heart of a fa- [illegible] none but the hearts of children. In [illegible] enemies of the Continent seek to separate [illegible] other Country: they will impute to us the dissensions which themselves occasion; since it is our duty to repress these, we shall on no account spare the malevolent who are the accessaries or instruments of the subtle hatred of our enemies. Continue your labours for the welfare of your country, and be assured of the blessings of the people, and of our perfect satisfaction."—(Moniteur, June 23.)

From Bayonne it is announced, that the Grand Duke of Berg is arrived in that city.

On the 11th inst. his Majesty the King of Spain appointed the Grand Duke of Berg Lieutenant-General of Spain.

MADRID, JUNE 10.—The nomination of King Joseph to fill the Spanish Throne has been announced to the public, in the following manner:—

"His Imperial and Royal Majesty having complied with the desire expressed by the Junta of the Government, the Council of Castile, the City of Madrid, and various Civil and Military Bodies in the State, that he would choose his illustrious brother Joseph Napoleon, the King of Naples, to be King of Spain; information has been given of this to his Majesty King Joseph, who has arrived at Bayonne. His Highness the Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom, having given the requisite orders concerning the journey of our Monarch into this capital, we have reason to believe, that we shall soon enjoy the presence of his Majesty."

JUNE 14.—The tidings of the happy renovation which our monarchy is about to undergo, have been forwarded to the American colonies with so much celerity, and by so many different ways, that we are sure of their arriving even at the remotest distances before the English will have had time to sow the seeds of discord. Besides, the Spaniards in America are so much on their guard against the English, that the reports they may spread will be credited by no one.

At Mexico, Lima, and Buenos Ayres, nothing more is desired than to be united to Spain; but at the same time the Colonies require to be governed with more justice and wisdom than at present. It is required that the career of military glory and mercantile industry be opened to the Spaniards of America. The new Dynasty has begun its government by expressing their good-will towards the Colonies; their Deputies are members of the general Junta; they cannot but profit by the changes which have taken place. We may soon hope that the extensive kingdoms of Mexico and Peru, instead of presenting to the English a coast almost neutral, or contributing very inconsiderably to the war, will henceforth oppose a formidable band of hostile warriors, ready to resist them on every part of their shores.

TURKEY.

BELGRADE, JUNE 5.—Within these few days the greatest activity has been evinced in strengthening this fortress, and that of Semendria: both are furnished with all kinds of provisions. These measures are taken, in case the Servian army, if beaten by the Turks, should be forced to retire.

From the other side of the Dardanelles a great number of troops are arriving, and, after a few days repose, continue their march to Adrianople, in order to unite with the army of the Grand Vizier, which, last autumn, scarcely amounted to 6000 men, and now, in consequence of the mandates given to all the Pachas, may consist of 100,000 men. The Pachas of Macedonia and Romalia have also repaired to Adrianople; the Agas of Bulgaria are collecting their troops at Rutschuck and Nissa. A firman of the Grand Signor nominates the Grand Vizier Commander in Chief of the Great Army, which encamp near Adrianople, and is destined to act against the Russians, in case hostilities should be renewed. Mustapha Baractar is to lead the army against the Servians.

GIBRALTAR.

JUNE 4.—An armistice has been concluded between the Patriot Government of Spain established at Seville, and our Commanders in Chief by sea and land here and at Cadiz, in consequence of which all hostilities have ceased, and we are affording every aid in our power to our new Allies!

The Phœbe frigate, commanded by Captain Oswald, is appointed to go to Algesiras this day, to receive General Castanos and his suite on board, to convey them to Cadiz, whence he is going to assume the command of the Spanish army.

Hostilities have already commenced between the French and Spaniards; and the advanced guard of the French army, 3000 men, have been completely defeated in the passes of the Sierra Morena, by the armed peasantry and smugglers. Between 3 and 400 of the prisoners had arrived at Seville when the last accounts left that place.

he Constituted Authorities of Seville assembled in the House, on the 27th of May, and constituted themselves Supreme Junta of Government. The following were easures which they adopted:—They proclaimed Ferdi- VII. King of Spain and the Indies, with the accustomed ities. They took possession of the artillery, muskets and r in the royal maestranza of artillery, and distributed them rposes of defence. They ordered all persons from 16 to o had not children, to enrol themselves, and after com- the regiments deficient in their proper numbers, they uted the remainder in new corps. They sent couriers to principal towns in the South of Spain, to invite them to the example of Seville. They ordered subordinate Jun- be established in all towns having 2000 householders to pend with and act under the Supreme Junta. All these res were carried into effect with the greatest promptness ecrity.

ARTHAGENA, MAY 24.—Ferdinand VII. was this day imed, in consequence of the popular cry in his favour. l Salcedo, who had received orders to carry the fleet to n, has been deprived of the command. A Junta of War sted, at the head of which is Lieut.-General Cisneros, der him Ciscar and other Officers. A felucca was sent to Mahon with this intelligence. The French Consul has board a Danish corvette, and all the stamped paper sent Madrid in the name of Murat, as Lieut.-General of the m, has been burned. Officers have been sent to rouse the of Granada, Murcia, and Valencia.

RANADA, MAY 29.—All the towns on the coast of Gra- have declared for Ferdinand VII. and the recruiting for rvice goes on briskly. Escalante, Captain-General of da, who had endeavoured to stifle the popular voice in of Ferdinand VII. has been deprived of his command, has been given to D. Joaquim Romano, Colonel of a nt of Spanish Cavalry. The proclamation of Ferdinand was effected by the influence of Don Joseph Santiago, mant of Artillery, after the Captain-General had used his to prevent it.

The people of Fuente de Cantos were taking oaths of allegiance to Ferdinand VII.—the spirit and patriotism of Badajos was excellent, and the organization was going on rapidly in all parts of Estramadura. A Partisan had marched with a corps from Rufra to Badajos, and such was the ardour by which they were animated, that they demanded to be led directly against Lisbon. The addresses from Seville to the People of Madrid, to the Spanish Nation, and to the Por- tuguese, are in the most enthusiastic style."

PRECAUTIONS

WHICH IT WILL BE PROPER TO OBSERVE THROUGHOUT THE DIFFERENT PROVINCES OF SPAIN, IN THE NECESSITY TO WHICH THEY HAVE BEEN DRIVEN BY THE FRENCH, OF RESISTING THE UNJUST AND VIOLENT POSSESSION WHICH THEIR ARMIES ARE ENDEAVOURING TO TAKE OF THE KINGDOM.

"We cannot doubt a moment of the exertions which the united Provinces of Spain would make to obstruct and defeat the malicious designs of the French, and that they will sacrifice even their lives on this occasion, the most important, and even unparalleled in the history of the nation, both in the thing it- self, and in the horrible means of ingratitude and perfidy by which the French have undertaken, pursued, and are still en- deavouring to effect our slavery:—

"1. Let the first object be to avoid all general actions, and to convince ourselves of the very great hazards, without any ad- vantage, or even the hope of it, to which they would expose us. The reasons of this resolution are many, and such as any one will discover who has the use of his understanding.

"2. A war of partisans is the system which suits us; the embarassing and wasting the enemy's armies by want of provi- sions, destroying bridges, throwing up entrenchments in proper situations, and other similar means. The situation of Spain, its many mountains, and the passes which they present, its rivers and torrents, and even the collocation of its provinces, invite us to carry on this species of warfare successfully.

"3. It is indispensible that each province should have its General, of known talents, and of such experience as our situa- tion permits, that his heroic loyalty should inspire the utmost confidence, and that every General should have under his com- mand officers of merit, particularly of artillery and engineers.

"4. As a combined union of plans is the soul of every well- concerted enterprize, and that which alone can promise and fa- cilitate a successful issue, it appears indispensible that there should be three Generalissimos, who should act in concert with each other—one who should command in the four kingdoms of Andalusia, in Murcia, and Lower Estramadura, and ano- ther in Galicia, Upper Estramadura, Old and New Castile, and Leon—another in Valencia, Arragon, and Catalonia; a person of the greatest credit being appointed to Navarre, the Biscayan Provinces, Montanus, Asturias, Rioja, and the North of Old Castile, for the purposes which will be mentioned hereaf- after.

"5. Each of these Generals and Generalissimos will form an army of veterans, troops and peasantry united, and put himself in a situation to undertake enterprizes, and to succour the most exposed points, keeping up always a frequent communication with the other Generalissimos, in order that all may act by common accord, and assist one another.

"6. Madrid and La Mancha require an especial General, to concert and execute the enterprizes which their particular local situation demands—his only object must be to embarrass the enemy's armies, to take away or cut off their provisions, attack them in flank and rear, and not to leave them a mome of repose. The courage of these inhabitants is well know-they will eagerly embrace such enterprizes if they are led as they should be. In the succession war the enemy entered twice to the interior of the kingdom, and even as far as its capital, and this was the cause of their defeat, their entire ruin, and their utter failure of success.

" 7. The Generalissimos of the North and East will block up the entrances to the Provinces under their command, and come to the assistance of any one that may be attacked by the enemy, to prevent as much as possible all pillage, and preserve its inhabitants from the desolation of war; the many mountains and defiles which are on the confines of these Provinces being favourable to such projects.

" 8. The destination of the General of Navarre, Biscay, and the rest of this Department is the most important of all, in which he will be assisted by the Generals of the North and East, with the troops and other succours which he stands in need of. His whole business must be to shut the entrance of Spain against fresh French troops, and to harrass and destroy those that return from Spain to France by this point. The very rugged local situation of these Provinces will be of singular advantage in such a design, and these enterprises, if well concerted, and carried into execution, will, no doubt, be successful: and the same may be understood of the different points by which the French troops which are in Portugal may come into Spain, or by which French troops may enter through Rolissillon into Catalana, for there is not much to be apprehended from Arragon. And, even from Portugal, it is not thought that they will escape, on account of the Proclamations which have been circulated in that kingdom, and the hatred which they before bore to the French being encreased without measure by the innumerable evils which they have been made to suffer, and the cruel oppression in which they are held by them.

" 9. At the same time it would be very proper that the Generalissimos should publish and circulate frequent Proclamations amongst the people, and rouse their courage and loyalty, shewing them that they have every thing to fear from the horrible perfidy with which the French have dealt with all Spain, and even with their King Ferdinand VII. and that if they rule over us all is lost, Kings, Monarchy, Property, Liberty, Independence and Religion; and that therefore it is necessary to sacrifice our lives and property in defence of the King and of the Country, and though our lot (which we hope will never come to pass) should destine us to become slaves, let us become so fighting and dying like gallant men, not giving up ourselves basely to the yoke like sheep, as the late infamous Government would have done, and fixing upon Spain and her slavery eternal ignomy and disgrace. France has never domineered over us, nor set her foot in our territory. We have many times mastered her, not by deceit, but by force of arms; we have made her Kings prisoners, and we have made the nation tremble—we are the same Spaniards, and France, and Europe, and the World shall see, that we are not less gallant, nor less brave than the most glorious of our ancestors.

" 10. All persons of education in the Provinces should be stimulated to frame, print, and publish frequent short discourses, in order to preserve the public opinion, and the ardour of the nation, confuting at the same time the infamous diaries of Madrid, which the baseness of the late Government has permitted, and still permits, to be published in Madrid itself, and has caused to be circulated abroad, detecting their falsehoods and continual contradictions; let them cover with shame the miserable authors of these diaries, and sometimes extend their remarks to those Charlatans, the French Gazetteers, and even to their Moniteurs; and let them display and publish to Spain, to all Europe, their horrible falsehoods and venal praises, for they afford abundant matter for such a work. Let all such perverted minds tremble at Spain, and let France know that the Spaniards have thoroughly penetrated their designs, and therefore it is that they justly detest and abominate them, and that they will sooner lay down their lives than submit to their iniquitous and humorous yoke.

" 11. Care shall be taken to explain to the nation, and to convince them, that when freed, as we trust to be, from this civil war, to which the French have forced us, and when placed in a state of tranquillity, our Lord and King Ferdinand VII. being restored to the Throne, under him and by him the Cortes will be assembled, abuses reformed, and such laws shall be enacted as the circumstances of the time and experience may dictate for the public good and happiness. Things which we Spaniards know how to do, which we have done as well as other nations, without any necessity that the vile French should come to instruct us, and, according to their custom, under the mask of friendship, and wishes for our happiness, should contrive, for this alone they are contriving, to plunder us, to violate our women, to assassinate us, to deprive us of our liberty, laws, and our King, to scoff at and destroy our holy religion, as they have hitherto done, and will always continue to do so as long as that spirit of perfidy and ambition which oppresses and tyrannizes over them shall endure.

INSTRUCTION

FROM THE SUPREME JUNTA OF THE GOVERNMENT, TO ALL CITIES AND TOWNS, TO BE EXECUTED WITH THE UTMOST PROMPTITUDE.

1. In cities and towns consisting of 2000 or more house holders, a Junta shall be established, which shall superintend all arrangements, and shall be obeyed by all the inhabitants; and in places of smaller size, the Ayuntamientos shall hold the place and perform the functions of the Juntas.

2. It is ordered, that with the concurrence of the ayuntamiento, clergy, prelates, priests, nobles and other persons so assembled, a Junta of six be formed to receive orders from the Supreme Junta, and correspond therewith, and in every particular act under their authority; and the inhabitants and the corregida are required to obey them in their office, and every thing thereunto appertaining.

3. It shall be the duty of this Junta to enlist the inhabitants from the age of 16 to 45, first, such as volunteer their services, and then all the secular inhabitants of the aforesaid age; to form them in companies, to assign them respectable persons for captains, lieutenants, and ensigns, with full power to name serjeants and corporals, which they will proceed to do with all possible dispatch.

4. They will instruct the towns of their districts, and even those of the neighbouring districts, to submit to the same regulations, enlistments, and appointments, and so advise the Junta thereof without delay.

5. For the present, each company shall remain in its district, but the Junta is empowered, if it think fit, to call together the enlisted companies in the other towns.

6. The Junta will name a confidential person to administer, under its direction, the funds which must meet the expences of the present occasion.

7. These funds shall be raised by orders of the Junta to all corporations and rich individuals, and over and above a subscription shall be opened, that all the inhabitants may contribute in proportion to their zeal for their King and country, and the urgent necessity of the cause.

8. To these funds shall be added patriotic loans of money, to be afterwards repaid in full; and it is expected from the public spirit of the inhabitants, that there will be no occasion for forced loans, or any other proceeding, which, though it might be violent, would still be justifiable by the necessity of the case.

9. This Proclamation (Bando) shall be printed and published by this Supreme Junta, and shall be placarded and circulated in all places.

10. All the Magistrates and Public Functionaries are for the present confirmed in their respective offices.

DDRESS TO THE PEOPLE OF PORTUGAL.

UGUESE—Your lot is perhaps the hardest ever endured people on the earth. Your Princes were compelled to you, and the events of Spain have furnished an irrefra-proof of the absolute necessity of that measure. You dared not to defend yourselves, and you did not defend ves. Junot offered to make you happy, and your hap-nas consisted in being treated with greater cruelty than st ferocious conquerors inflict on the people whom they bdued by force of arms, and after the most obstinate re-. You have been despoiled of your Princes, your laws, nages, your customs, your property, your liberty, even ives, and your holy religion, which your enemies never spected, however they may, according to their custom, romised to protect it, and however they may affect and to have any sense of it themselves. Your nobility has nihilated, its property confiscated in punishment of its and loyalty. You have been basely dragged to foreign es, and compelled to prostrate yourselves at the feet of n who is the author of all your calamities, and who, by st horrible perfidy, has usurped your Government, and ou with a sceptre of iron. Even now your troops have ur borders, and are travelling in chains to die in the de f him who has oppressed you, by which means his deep ity may accomplish his purpose, by destroying those who constitute your strength, and by rendering their lives sub-t to his triumphs, and to the savage glory to which he .

n beheld your slavery, and the horrible evils which fol-it with mingled sensations of grief and despair. You are ethren, and she panted to fly to your assistance. But cer-hiefs, and a Government either weak or corrupt, kept her ins, and were preparing the means by which the ruin of ng, our laws, our independence, our liberty, our lives, and even the holy religion in which we are united, might ac-company yours, by which a barbarous people might consummate their own triumph, and accomplish the slavery of every nation in Europe—our loyalty, our honour, our justice, could not sub-mit to such flagrant atrocity. We have broken our chains—let us then to action—we have armies, we have chiefs, and the uni-versal cry of Spain is, we will die in defence of our country, but we will take care that these infamous enemies shall die with us.— Come, then, ye generous Portuguese, unite with Spain to die in defence of your country—her banners expect you, they will re-ceive you as brethren infamously oppressed. The cause of Spain and of Portugal is the same—distrust not our troops—their wishes are the same as your own, and you may reckon upon their courage and their strength as part of your security.

You have among yourselves the object of your vengeance—obey not the authors of your misfortune—attack them—they are but a handful of miserable panic-struck men, humiliated and conquered already by the perfidy and cruelties which they have committed, and which have covered them with disgrace in the eyes of Europe and the World! Rise then in a body, but avoid staining your honourable hands with crimes, for your de-sign is to resist them and to destroy them—our united efforts will do for this perfidious nation; and Portugal, Spain, may all Europe, shall breathe or die free and like men.

Portuguese—Your country is not in danger—it is already gone—unite, unite, and fly to restore and to save it.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, JULY 4.

PROROGATION.

The Lord Chancellor addressed the following Speech to the Members of both Houses of Parliament:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We have it in command from his Majesty to express to you "the great satisfaction which he derives from being enabled, by "putting an end to the present Session of Parliament, to termi-"nate the laborious attendance which the public business has "required of you.

"The measure which you have adopted for the improvement "of the military force of the country, promises to lay the foun-"dation of a system of internal defence eminently useful, and "peculiarly adapted to the exigencies of these times.

"The sanction which you have given to those measures of "defensive retaliation, to which the violent attacks of the ene-"my, upon the commerce and resources of this kingdom com-"pelled his Majesty to resort, has been highly satisfactory to "his Majesty.

"His Majesty doubts not that in the result the enemy will be "convinced of the impolicy of persevering in a system which "retorts upon himself, in so much greater proportion, those evils "which he endeavours to inflict upon this country.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"We are commanded by his Majesty to return his most hearty "acknowledgments for the cheerfulness and liberality with "which the necessary Supplies for the current year have been "provided.

"His Majesty directs us to assure you, that he participates "in the satisfaction with which you must have contemplated "the flourishing situation of the revenue and credit of the coun-"try, notwithstanding the continued pressure of the war: and "he congratulates you upon having been enabled to provide for "the exigencies of the public service, with so small an addition "to the public burdens.

"His Majesty commands us to thank you for having enabled "him to make good his engagements with his Allies; and to ex-"press to you the particular gratification which he has derived "from the manner in which you have provided for the Establi-"shment of his Sister, her Royal Highness the Duchess of "Brunswick.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"His Majesty has great satisfaction in informing you, that, "notwithstanding the formidable Confederacy united against "his Ally the King of Sweden, that Sovereign persevers, wi "unabated vigour and constancy, to maintain the honour "independence of his Crown, and that no effort has been w " contest in which he is engaged.

" The recent transactions in Spain and Italy have exhibited " new and striking proofs of the unbounded and unprincipled ambition which actuates the common enemy of every established " and independent Nation in the world.

" His Majesty views with the liveliest interest, the loyal and " determined spirit manifested by the Spanish Nation, in resisting the violence and perfidy with which their dearest rights " have been assailed.

" The Spanish nation, thus nobly struggling against the tyranny and usurpation of France, can no longer be considered " as the enemy of Great Britain; but is recognized by his Majesty as a natural Friend and Ally.

" We are commanded to inform you that his Majesty has received communications from several of the provinces of Spain, " soliciting the aid of his Majesty. The Answer of his Majesty " to these communications has been received in Spain, with " every demonstration of those sentiments of confidence and affection which are congenial to the feelings and true interest of " both nations; and his Majesty commands us to assure you, " that he will continue to make every exertion in his power " for the support of the Spanish cause: guided in the choice " and the direction of his exertions by the wishes of those in " whose behalf they are employed.

" In contributing to the success of this just and glorious cause, " his Majesty has no other object than that of preserving unimpaired the integrity and independence of the Spanish Monarchy. But he trusts that the same efforts which are directed " to that great object may, under the blessing of Divine Providence, lead in their effects, and by their example, to the " restoration of the liberties and the peace of Europe."

The Commission for proroguing the Parliament being then read, the Lord Chancellor addressed both Houses as follows:—

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

" By virtue of his Majesty's Commission to us and to other " Noble Lords directed, and now read, we do in his Majesty's " name, and in obedience to his commands, prorogue this present Parliament to Wednesday, the 20th day of August next, " to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly " prorogued to Wednesday, the 20th day of August next."

The Commons having withdrawn, their Lordships soon after separated.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, JULY 4.

Mr. W. Pole moved, that a new writ be issued for the election of a Member for Rye, in the room of Sir William Elford, who had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds. Also for the election of a Knight of the Shire for the county of Clare, in the room of Colonel Burton, who had accepted the office of Escheator of Munster.

AFFAIRS OF SPAIN.

Mr. Whitbread rose and said, he had waited to the very last moment that an opportunity could be allowed him, in anxious hope and expectation that his Majesty's Ministers would, in some shape or other, have endeavoured to produce from that House some declaration of its sentiments with regard to the interesting affairs of the Spanish nation, under the knowledge of those important circumstances which had recently transpired; and he felt some surprise that no such endeavour was made before the moment destined for the separation of Parliament. Upon a former night, when the situation of Spain was in some degree urged upon the consideration of the House, he was the person foremost to deprecate discussion on the subject, and the reason was, because it had not then been known that the Spanish nation had, with any thing like a general sentiment, declared against the proceedings of the French Government towards their country; in which case, discussion in that House might expose the Spaniards to the danger of new and accumulated severities and oppressions. Things had since, however, taken a new turn: the Spanish nation had nobly and generally declared its determination to resist the tyrannical encroachments of France, and had flown to arms for the purpose. Sincerely did he pray that God might send them success; and this he was sure was the devout and earnest wish, not only throughout this country, but through the civilized world; and he had no the least doubt that it was the Intention of his Majesty's Government, as well as the unanimous desire of the people of England, that every support which the resources and energies of this country could afford, should be given to the people of Spain in their present arduous and glorious struggle. He did hope, however, that after the recent letter addressed by the Noble Lord opposite to him to the Lord Mayor of London, on the subject of Spanish affairs, that his Majesty's Chancellor of the Exchequer would, ere this, have come down to the House to call for a Vote of Credit to aid his Majesty in the support of Spain; and he was sure if he had done so, it would have met the chearful and unanimous acquiescence of the House, who would have joined in the declaration of their warmest approbation of a purpose in which every British subject must feel a lively interest. It was now, however, too late, and the House must for the present only regret the privation of an opportunity of declaring their hearty approbation of a purpose, which opened one more prospect of the salvation of Europe; but he could not suffer the prorogation to take place without expressing his sentiments on the subject; and having done so, he wished not any farther to detain the House, than by expressing his firm conviction, that in expressing his own sentiments, he had declared the unanimous sense of Parliament, and of the country at large.

Lord Castlereagh said, the sentiments just expressed by the Hon. Gentleman, were not only congenial to the feelings of his Majesty's Ministers, but, he was confident, to the unanimous feelings of that House, and of every man in the county. With regard to the regret expressed by the Hon. Gentleman that Ministers did not come down to the House to claim from Parliament some expression of its sentiments on this subject, he thought it would have been rather premature in them so to have done, before circumstances were ripe for a co-operation, in which he relied with confidence for the ready concurrence and support of both Houses; that they had not come down to claim a Vote of Credit, because they felt no want of ample means to pursue measures of effective aid to the Spanish nation. At a future time they might find it necessary to apply to the liberality of Parliament, both for aid and counsel, in pursuit of those measures, in which they were about to embark with energy, and he hoped with effect. He could, however, assure the Hon. Gentleman, and the House, of the determination of his Majesty's Government, that no exertion which could be made, nor any effort which the strength and resources of this country could furnish, should be wanting to the support of the Spanish nation.

A Message was now brought down from the Lords, by Mr. Quarme, Deputy Black Rod, desiring the attendance of the House in the House of Peers, to hear his Majesty's Commission read for declaring the Royal assent to certain Bills, and for proroguing the present Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, numerously attended, went forthwith up, and being returned, read to the Members a Copy of his Majesty's Speech, proroguing both Houses; immediately after which the Members separated.

IRELAND.

Dublin, July 4.—The Expedition will be ready to leave Cove this evening, at which time 300 horses will be embarked. The Commander in Chief, Sir A. Wellesley, left town this morning to join the brave and gallant army he is to command. The whole, we believe, will sail by Wednesday evening or Thursday morning. There never was an armament that left this country, for the success of which the public heart was so softened by so many and generous emotions.

" Dublin, July 5.—We turn with pain from the subject of foreign affairs to one of a domestic nature, calling, we think, for the speedy interposition of Government. We have to state, upon unquestionable authority, that on the 23d of last month, some men, women, and children, assembled about a mile from Newry, to dance round a bonfire, as is customary on St. John's Eve; when in the enjoyment of their old and harmless amusement, the poor people were attacked by a number of men, armed with muskets and bayonets; one young man was killed, and others severely wounded. There was a person arrested at the time, charged with taking an active part in this shocking outrage, but the assailants attacked the house in which he was secured, and were in the act of burning it until he was set at liberty."

Drogheda, June 23.—An unfortunate transaction took place in Ardee on Saturday evening last: Mr. Kilpatrick, of Dundalk, Excise Officer, assisted by a serjeant's detachment of Queen's Bay, seized a quantity of malt in the town and neighbourhood of Ardee, and having procured carts to convey the seizure to Dundalk, the party were attacked by a number of men, armed with muskets, near the town, who fired on them, and on the first discharge the serjeant was shot dead; the second wounded two men (one dangerously) and a horse. SATURDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

Downing-street, July 9, 1808.

A dispatch, of which the following is a copy, together with inclosures, have been received from Major-General Spencer by Viscount Castlereagh, one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, dated off Cadiz, June 12, 1808.

His Majesty's ship Atlas, off Cadiz,

MY LORD, June 12, 1808.

The French squadron, consisting of five sail of the line and a frigate, having placed themselves in a defensive position, in the channel leading to the Caraccas, and out of the reach of the works of Cadiz, and having refused to listen to any terms, I have great satisfaction in reporting, that the Spanish gun and mortar boats, and the batteries erected for this purpose, on the Isle of Leon, and near Fort Louis, commenced hostilities against the French ships, at three o'clock in the afternoon of the 9th, and the firing continued without interruption on both sides till night. It was renewed on the part of the Spaniards on the morning of the 10th, and partially continued till two, when a flag of truce was hoisted by the French, but the terms proposed being inadmissible, the Spaniards intend to re-commence hostilities with an additional battery, to the Eastward of Fort Louis, consisting of thirty twenty-four pounders.

Admiral Purvis and myself wished to have co-operated in this attack, but the Spaniards feeling themselves confident in their own force, have declined our offers of assistance.

The Supreme Council of Seville have nominated Commissioners, and applied last night for passports, and a frigate to convey them to England, and they are also equally anxious to send Feluccas with dispatches to South America.

Information having been received that a small French corps was assembling at Tavira, with a view of entering Spain by the River Guadiana, we have been requested to proceed against this corps, and either to attack them on the coast, or endeavour to prevent the further prosecution of their plans against Spain. I accordingly propose to sail immediately for this object, Lord Collingwood approving of it.

Admiral Purvis had already detached three ships of war off the mouth of the Guadiana, and has offered every other necessary assistance, which Lord Collingwood has since confirmed.

I have the honour to be, &c.

B. SPENCER, Major-General.

Right Hon. Lord Castlereagh, &c. &c. &c.

Copy of a Letter from General Morla, Captain-General of Andalusia and Governor of Cadiz, addressed to their Excellencies Admiral Purvis and Major-General Spencer.

Admiral Rossilly, as your Excellencies will observe by the annexed copy, has proposed to disarm, upon conditions which I thought were inadmissible. Whatever may be his terms of surrender, I shall in no manner deviate from my promise; it is therefore necessary that I should have your consent, as I have already said in my first conference with Brigadier General Smith and Captain Sir John Gore, to whom I have pledged myself with simplicity and good faith.

It will afford me considerable satisfaction to consult with your Excellencies on all occurrences, incidents, and circumstances, conducive to our common advantage, and contrary to the interests of the common enemy.

Nothing gives me more real pleasure than the absolute confidence of your Excellencies in my candour and sincerity, with which I remain your Excellencies most affectionate and devoted Servant. (Signed) THOMAS MORLA.

Cadiz, June 11, 1808.

Copy of a Letter from Admiral Rosilly, addressed to General Morla, dated on board the Admiral's ship, Hero Bay, off Cadiz, June 11, 1808.

CAPTAIN-GENERAL,—Obliged to defend myself on account of the inquietude inspired into the people of this province by my imposing attitude, I yesterday, in order to tranquillize them, proposed to your Excellency to quit the Bay. In case the English cannot accede to this proposal, I suggest the idea of disembarking my means of attack, and keeping my ships' companies on board; no colours shall be displayed on my squadron. Hostages shall be given for our security, our sick, and all the French people in the province, with their national and individual property Hostages will be equally given on my part. The refreshments, water, and provisions necessary for my squadron shall be provided on my paying for them, as has hitherto been done. In short, I shall demand no conditions but those which are necessary for my honour and that of the people serving under my orders, and as are compatible with the public tranquillity.

Deprived by my proposal of the means of defence against the exterior enemy, I demand security against them.

Receive, Captain-General, the renewal of my distinguished consideration, with which I am your Excellency's most humble servant. (Signed) ROSILLY.

Copy of an Answer from General Morla to Admiral Rossilly.

EXCELLENT SIR, ADMIRAL ROSSILLY,—In answer to certain proposals and official demands transmitted by your Excellency, which, although dictated by your honour, are unquestionably incompatible with mine, as must be evident to your Excellency. I have to acquaint you, that I cannot accept any terms but an unconditional surrender. My honour and character not allowing me to depart in any way from my promises, I therefore inform you, that my orders from the Superior Council being positive with respect to the surrender of the squadron commanded by your Excellency, I cannot enter into any conditions without previously consulting them. It is likewise my duty to consult with the English Commanders, as, without their consent, I cannot compromise myself.

For these reasons, I shall suspend my attack, until I have dispatched those two expresses, availing myself however of the intermediate time to prepare other means for the attack.

Nothing opposes the individual esteem entertained for your Excellency, by your faithful servant,

(Signed) THOMAS MORLA.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

With the most heartfelt satisfaction we announce the continuation of favourable intelligence from Spain. The Patriots display with uncommon nobleness of spirit, fervour, and vigour, so much deliberative ability, and systematic effort, that we are impressed with the highest opinion of the talents of their leaders, and feel a very lively confidence in the success of their endeavours. Their instructions are cool, wise, and determined; their Proclamations full of ardour and animation, are admirably calculated to rouse the long dormant energies of the country. In proof of the truth of the first of these observations, we particularly call the attention of our Readers to their detail of measures termed "precautionary," and the instructions of the Supreme Junta to the cities and towns. How wretched the Government which could yield the country up to France, without rousing such courage and patriotism to resistance!

While the contents of the dispatches detailed in the last night's Gazette, were but superficially known, many people considered the news from Cadiz to be not quite so favourable as they could have wished. A due examination of the correspondence between the Captain-General and Adm. Rossilly, must remove every impression of the kind.

There is an exalted principle in the Spanish conduct which forms a striking contrast to the cold-blooded perfidy so frequently displayed in that of the French. The resolution they have adopted, of compelling the surrender of the enemy, without calling in the aid of the British, as it proceeds not from mistrust, must be attributed to a feeling of honour, bordering, indeed, upon the romantic, but perfectly congenial with what we have always understood to be the Spanish character. To have conquered with the assistance of a British Squadron, would neither have given confidence to their countrymen, nor splendour to their arms. We like to see this noble reliance upon themselves, it will give dignity to their efforts, and convince the enemy of the determined spirit of the resentment he has dared to provoke.

Independently of their galling sense of French treachery and oppression, and the nobler feelings which they have so effectually excited, the cooler calculation of interest must convince the Spanish people of their immense stake in this contest. With JOSEPH BONAPARTE for their King, could they preserve their possessions in America? Would not their colonies become convinced of the necessity of declaring themselves independent, to become secured from the tyranny of France, and the exactions of Frenchmen? Were they to yield to his sway, the hostility of Great Britain, however reluctantly, must be again directed against them; and thus deprived of their immense resources in America, shut out from commerce, and shut up with France, their consequence as a nation would be lost for ever.

It was last night confidently and generally reported in the city, that a Treaty of Peace has been signed between Russia, Sweden, and Denmark; and that Sir J. MOORE's Expedition was in sight of Portsmouth yesterday morning, steering down the Channel for Lisbon.

The above rumour is of a most extraordinary kind. That the Armament has left the Baltic appears certain; consequently it must be presumed that our forces could not be beneficially employed in co-operation with Sweden. The public having no grounds upon which to found an opinion must wait the explanation with patience, it cannot be delayed longer than a few days. All previous conjecture and reasoning would be perfectly nugatory.

Recent events of some kind or other (indeed the public can ascertain some of them) have caused a considerable change in projected military movements. It is now understood that a grand expedition, of which the Earl of Chatham is to have the command, is resolved on, which will embrace troops that were destined for other services. The Earl is to have with him two Lieutenant-Generals, Sir J. Moore and Sir Arthur Wellesley. His army will be in all 40,000 men. His Royal Highness the Duke of York was, and is exremely desirous to have the command; and there are not wanting great authorities for the rumour that he is yet determined to carry his desire into execution. The place and object of the expedition are probably changed. It may no longer be necessary for any part of it to go to Portugal. An effectual diversion may be made elsewhere, and the very uncertainty of the point of attack is itself a diversion.

It has been reported during the week that General Dumourier was about to join the standard of the Spanish Patriots—we are happy to say there is no truth in the report. It would be highly improper to entrust that general with a command; we are confident that some unfortunate circumstance would result from the measure.

Mr. Graham is a man of tivity and zeal; but unfortunately, we fear, of so little t in theatrical matters, as to be by no means calculated very important office of guiding a theatre. Theatrical t is made up of two qualities—a taste naturally good, ng experience. Mr. Graham seems to have begun his thout either of these qualifications. To be sure, he has cupied with this concern for several years, and people agine that by this time he must have at least experience : But that will not do: Experience in these matters is irable improver of natural taste; but without natural is likely in general to produce nothing but obstinacy. ust be good ground for experience to work upon in the tance: and without such a ground we laugh at all the of experience. So one hears a man at his own hou e es triumphantly declare to his guests, that the port he is canting may be warranted excellent, for that he himself it near seven years in his cellar—never considering that re originally bad, all the preservation in the world will never cause it to be good. And yet principally to Mr. Graham was left the duty of reading the plays and engaging the actors!

When Mr. Liston appeared at the Haymaket, Mr. Graham went to see him act. He did not much like him; but whether from the general good report concerning that excellent actor, or from what other cause we know not, Mr. Graham was induced to go again. He did not like him this time; but again he went to see him. Now, he made up his mind, and positively determined not to engage him at Drury-Lane. No man perhaps ever went more deliberately wrong than Mr. Graham in this instance: and of all mistaken folks, surely people who make their mistakes upon reflection, are the most to be feared, and the least to be trusted. In the meanwhile, Mr. Harris, the Proprietor of Covent-Garden, who had about him some people that could estimate good effective acting, was persuaded to engage Mr. Liston: and at this moment Mr. Liston is as great a favourite as Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Bannister, or even Mr. Munden himself.

Another gross instance of mismanagement on the part of the Drury-Lane administration, has been shewn in the behaviour of the directing powers toward Mr. Young. Mr. Young is an actor by no means of the first rate, but certainly very superior to any tragedian who is to be found at Drury-Lane. But he has not been engaged at Drury-Lane; and perhaps the public will wonder why. Why because the directors of that Theatre do not know their own interests. They are unfortunate upon more than one account in their neglect of Mr. Young; and we will shew how.

In the first place, although tragedy flourishes much more fairly at Covent-Garden than at Drury-Lane, by reason of the united forces of Mrs. Siddons, the Kembles, and Mr. Cooke, (who is indeed, in our opinion, a bad tragedian, but who does nevertheless in certain tragic parts attract the town) yet each London Theatre ought to have the means of acting tragedies now and then. It must be of little use, to be sure, for Drury-Lane to put up Macbeth or Hamlet on the same nights when those plays are acted at Covent-Garden; but when a new comedy is running at Covent-Garden, and when the weekly recurrence of Monday, and the concomitant superfluity of Saturday's wages sends the lower class of people to the play, who all like tragedy better than comedy, then it becomes material for a Theatre to possess somebody who has some notion of playing tragedy. For though the lower people cannot understand the niceties of the art, yet common feeling will tell them when an actor plays violently ill, and they will be displeased with his performance, and come less willingly another time. Now, Mr. Elliston's tragedy, with very few exceptions, is so extremely bad as to be really almost too heavy for common patience; and it certainly would have answered to the Proprietors to engage Mr. Young, if it had been only for the sake of having the principal parts in the usual tragedies acted with tolerable "emphasis and discretion."

But there is another reason, of infinitely more force even than this, which ought to have decided the Managers to engage Mr. Young. And this reason is what the politicians of greater circles call, "The preservation of the balance of power." It has happened of late, that one or two actors have, by the weakness of the government, erected themselves into so vast a consideration, that they are almost the masters of the theatre which they were engaged to serve: and the more weak the government may be, the more earnestly ought it to seek for some influence, to be opposed against the encroachers. Mr. Elliston, from his willingness to play in every line, from the impotence of the supreme authorities in the theatre, and from the scarcity of dramatic talent in the present day, has risen in Drury-lane to an importance which is almost despotic. The real excellence of his comedy bears up the trash of his tragedy, and managers, authors, and actors, all bow to the talents, the courage, and the good fortune of Mr. Elliston. It is time that his empire should be divided, the power is too great for one man. Long may we enjoy the advantage of Mr. Elliston's comic powers: but for tragedy, the public had a right to expect the engagement of Mr. Young, and the rulers of the theatre would have strengthened their authority by the measure. Statesmen have found that, though a First Lord of the Treasury with associated Lords may be useful and necessary, yet the whole power vested in one Lord Treasurer is dangerous to the country. We have no objection to see Mr. Elliston First Lord of the Treasury, but we do not like to see him, or any other individual, acting as Lord Treasurer.

In the next number of the Dramatic Detector, we shall speak of the conduct which is pursued at Covent-Garden concerning actors.

Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be continued at 12½d. the quartern loaf of wheaten, and 10½d household.

DOWNFALL OF BUONAPARTE.

A Divine of no less eccentricity than erudition, and a great admirer of Fleming's Commentaries on the Revelations, says, that the Downfall of Buonaparte is nigh at hand, grounding his assertion on particular texts in the 13th chapter of the book of Revelation:—The Beast rising out of the Sea (Corsica) with seven heads and ten horns, and upon his ten horns ten crowns—is Buonaparte. This Beast was to have reigned forty and two months.—As Emperor of France, Buonaparte has nearly reigned this exact number of months.—The Dragon (i. e. the Devil) gave him this power and great authority; and he caused all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand—i.e. Buonaparte has caused all persons to submit to his tyranny.—The Beast's number was six hundred three score and six, which exactly corresponds with the numerical calculation of all the letters in Buonaparte's name, reckoning the letters according to the number affixed to each before the introduction of figures, thus:—N=40, A=1, P=60, O=50, L=20, E=5, A=1, N=50, (the letters of his Christian name); B=2, U=110, O=50, N=40, A=1, P=60, A=1, R=80, T=100, E=5, being the letters in his Surname, amounting altogether to 666, the identical number of the Beast—i. e. Buonaparte. This Divine adds, that without the smallest doubt, as the truth of Revelation can never be questioned, so it follows that the Spanish Patriots are destined to put an end to the reign of this Beast—(Buonaparte.)

LAW REPORT.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, TUESDAY JULY 5.

CRIMINAL INFORMATION.

Mr. Topping applied for leave to file a criminal information against George Forrester, Esq. a gentleman not unknown in our Courts. The motion was made upon the affidavit of the Rev. Mr. Wardel, who had been joint tenant with the Defendant of a manor in Worcestershire. This instrument stated, that some time since Mr. Wardel, the Rector of a parish in that county, proposed to sell his share of the manor to Mr. Forrester, who agreed to pay him for it the sum of 16,000*l.* Subsequent to this contract, disputes arose between the parties, respecting the payment, when Mr. Wardel was compelled to file a bill in the Exchequer, and in March last he obtained a decree in his favour, ordering the discharge of the debt by Mr. Forrester. After this proceeding, Mr. Forrester appeared in Church, while the Prosecutor was performing Divine Service, and insulted him, by making grimaces at him, in the view of the whole congregation. Mr. Wardel then went to London, and, during his absence, Mr. Forrester, having the whole manor under his controul, attended by one of the church wardens, of the name of Bayles, who was entirely devoted to his interests, and about thirty persons, with ribbons in their hats, on the 19th of March, issued from his own house, proceeded to the Church, broke open the doors, and, by means of new ropes, (Mr. Wardel having directed the old ones to be removed) and the ringers of a neighbouring parish, sounded a merry peal, in triumph of a supposed victory gained over the Rev. Clergyman. It was here, amid this disgusting scene of profanation and riot in the Church, that Mr. Forrester pulled a paper from his pocket, and read the following passage to the disorderly assembly:—"Scrub (meaning the Prosecutor) was buried on Monday, at Worcester," alluding to the period when Mr. Wardel had signed the deeds of conveyance of the manor to the Defendant. A day or two after Mr. Forrester had thus wantonly expressed his satisfaction, he procured a painter, named Hickey, to inscribe on the walls of the parish church, various passages from Scripture, the tendency of which was either to expose Mr. Wardel to derision, or to hold himself up to admiration. One of these was taken from the gospel of St. Luke: "My house is a house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves." Another was taken from the Psalms: "Thine hand shall find out all thine enemies; thy right hand shall find out those that hate thee;" besides many more of the same description. Soon afterwards Mr. Wardel returned, and when he was sitting at the desk, in the church, on Whit-sunday, Mr. Forrester came close up to him, and read in a loud voice one of the passages which he had procured to be painted upon the walls; thus personally insulting the Reverend Clergyman in the exercise of his functions, and interrupting the performance of the sacred duties of the day. The motion of the Learned Counsel was not confined to Mr. Forrester alone, but extended to Mr. Bayley, the Churchwarden, who had been appointed by him, and two persons who were principally active during the riot in the church on the 19th of March, including also Hickey, the person who had been employed to deface the church walls. The Court refused the Rule; recommending at the same time, that the parties should apply to the Ecclesiastical Court.

PUBLIC OFFICE, BOW-STREET.

BEFORE MR. JUSTICE READ.

On Thursday evening Thomas Northwood was brough the Magistrate, on a charge of larceny, on the prose Mr. Michaut. The case was of peculiar interest to art especially to the workers in the precious metals. From ture of the evidence, and the statement of Mr. Knapp, sel for the prosecution, the circumstances were as follow

Mr. Michaut, a native of Switzerland, a long time in this country, is an eminent working jeweller in Ph street, Bloomsbury, and had taken into partnership named Davis, who continued with him in that capaci four years. He had also taught Northwood his business, Michaut, who is a man of eminent taste and ingenuity, vented a number of dies, punches, and models, for ex artnership between him and Davis continued up to the 30th e, at which time it was dissolved by mutual agreement, orthwood took an opportunity of quitting his master's sera short time before, and entering into partnership with

, in consequence of a plan supposed to be long preconcert-
Mr. Michaut, at the time of Davis's separation, offered is option, to take with him any portion of the imple-or any of the journeymen he chose, which Davis de-
, in consequence of which Mr. Michaut paid to the part-p 200*l*. Mr. Michaut, who had taught Northwood to make dies and punches, and confidently employed him for that se (it being quite a secret to the rest of the trade), had for ime missed a number of his models, and of course suspect-t Northwood had taken them clandestinely away. He ore obtained a search-warrant, and accompanied by Lar, the officer, proceeded to search the lodgings of North-where a number of those models and patterns were found,
Mr. Michaud knew to be his property.

er their departure thence they met Northwood in the street, irst denied that he had any of those articles, but said all ols were removed to Davis's—thither they proceeded.
the room where Northwood worked, they found a numlichaut knew to be his own, and to him of considerable

Northwood, at first, insisted they were his, but after-acknowledged to the officer that he had clandestinely the dies from which those punches were made, and the rticles, at different times, about Christmas last, from Mr. ut's house, and also the several other articles found at his lodgings. Upon this Northwood was apprehended, and ht before the Magistrate.

Alley, as Counsel for Northwood, argued, that as it did pear that the articles were taken since the dissolution of ership, the property was, of course, joint in Davis and rosecutor, and not distinctly that of the latter, as charged; pon that ground an indictment on this charge would not be ned. He said, however, that he had advised both North-and Davis to give up this property, and compromise with lichaut. Davis, however, still insisted that the steel of unches was his, although he did not deny the dies were lichaut's.—Mr. Alley then advised Mr. Michaut to take unches, and let Mr. Davis, if he would, venture to bring tion for the steel, which Mr. Michaut did, and the matter erminated.

Nearly one hundred persons have been cured or highly benefited thereby in less than three weeks, one of whom recovered the Sight of an Eye, lost by the Small-pox for forty-four years! another of an Eye he had lost by the Measles upwards of thirty years! another, of an Eye which was pronounced by the Faculty to be perishing, and in which the person had been blind, by (what was termed) the Gutta Serena, for nearly three years; another, a Gentleman in the 80th year of his age, in the course of three days has so much recovered the sight of an eye he had lost, as to ascertain large objects!! Mr. and Mrs. W. beg to inform the Public, that (in addition to the above) great numbers have been cured of the most alarming Inflammations of the Eyes, and of excessive Weakness and Defect of Sight, after every other application had failed, of which they have the strongest and most respectable testimonials in their possession, sanctioned by oath, and witnessed by two Magistrates, and which will be most cheerfully shewn (as well as reference given), to the full satisfaction of every inquirer, at their Residence, every day (Sunday's excepted), from one till five o'clock.—Mr. or Mrs. Williams must apply the Remedy in person.—N. B. No letters attended to, unless post paid.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

The Westminster Sessions finished yesterday, with a gaol delivery, when a horde of sturdy vagrants were let loose on the public. Some of the most daring amongst these beggars were reprimanded to prison for different periods, and amongst these were two impostors, habited as disabled seamen, of the name of Jones and Wood, whose audacity surpassed any thing we heard. They are old faces about Charing Cross, and their manner of terrifying passengers, by what is technically termed asking arms, was little better than highway robbery.

FRENCH PRISONER ESCAPED.—Louis Horori Bardouil, a Lieutenant of the French land forces, was yesterday taken to the Transport Office, belonging to St. George's parish, charged with breaking his parole of honour, at Litchfield. Information had been received of the prisoner's escape some time, but he eluded all vigilance until Friday, when he was secured in Stafford-street, Bond-street. He has been five years a prisoner in this country, and was taken by a privateer on his passage with some French forces to St. Domingo. He was formerly aid-de-camp to the noted Robespiere. The prisoner was conveyed to Tothil-fields, Bridewell, and ordered to be conveyed on board a prison ship on Monday next.

A melancholy accident happened between five and six o'clock Tuesday morning, at the house of Lady Campbell, of Wimpole-street. Her Ladyship had given a grand supper and ball, at the conclusion of which as Mr. T. Calvert, a young gentleman, in the 23d year of his age, son of —— Calvert, Esq. of North Audley-street, was dancing a reel with two young ladies, he broke a blood vessel, fell down, and instantly expired.

A melancholy accident occurred on Wednesday morning in the Strand, at the house of a shoe-maker near the New Church. A fine child, of seventeen months old, through the carelessness of a girl, fell down a privy, and was suffocated before any assistance could be rendered. The poor infant was extricated by the humane exertions of a coal-porter, in ten minutes after it fell in; but it was found that its skull was fractured by the wall against which it fell on its descent.

On Wednesday afternoon, as Mr. Tyrrell, master-rigger, at Deptford, was going along the Isle of Dogs, from Blackwall, on his way home, it is supposed he was seized with a fit, and rolled into a ditch, where he was found suffocated in the mud.

MARRIED.

At St. George's, Hanover-square, Charles Hulse, Esq. eldest son of Sir E. Hulse, Bart. of Breamore House, in the county of Hants, to Miss Maria Buller, second daughter of the late John Buller, Morvall, in the County of Cornwall, Esq.

DIED.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER TWENTY-NINE.

N A CO-OPERATION IN FAVOUR OF SPAIN BE EXPECTED FROM AUSTRIA?

olitical discussions, even in ordinary events, are so le to mistake, that the political writer should adopt the est degree of caution in his disquisitions. Actuated by principle we endeavoured, in opposition to our warmest es and heartfelt participation in the efforts of a gene- people, to restrain our desires, and to examine the accounts we received from Spain with an unbiassed gment, and according to the experience of late events. dopting this prudential course the superficial or too gaine observer might suppose, that some of our pre- ng Numbers had a tendency to weaken the public in- st in favour of the Spanish Patriots. We have been so uently disappointed in the course of sixteen years; we e been projects, apparently suggested by the highest tical sagacity, so easily frustrated, that we thought it dent to wait for official communications, or more re- r intelligence, before we could renounce facts and ex- ence, for the first uncertain and unofficial accounts we ived relative to the Spanish Insurrection.

owever, as an obstinate adherence to error is not the acter of this Paper, and as a higher object is proposed than to support the interests of a party, in opposition e general interests of the community, we make now ifficulty of declaring, whatever distrust or apprehen- we felt in the commencement, that the situation of n is such at present as to promise a result, which the sanguine, or the most enthusiastic, would not have d to expect three months ago.

very new intelligence brings a corroboration of this ion. It is not the partial insurrection of a few towns stricts, or of one or two provinces—it is the simulta- s rising of a grossly offended people. Abandoned as were by those to whom they were accustomed to look or counsel or redress, they were obliged to appeal to selves in this extraordinary emergency. All those lations and contracts, which formed a code of poli- jurisprudence for the several States of the Continent, violated and rendered null by the very man, who ected their subjection and ruin. Fortunately however this unprincipled man had lost sight of, or, in the insti- e of his success, disregarded the circumspection he d it expedient to observe in his preceeding transac- . But on this occasion, he was guilty of the most un- oked violation of every thing that is dear to a people, out even condescending to palliate the aggression. ries are forgotten by a people, as well as by indivi- s—but insults never. And here the insult is aggra- d by the gross contempt he shewed for the feelings understandings of that gallant people, and by the ness and perfidy he displayed during the whole trans- n.

ow that we have the circumstances of that iniquitous ag[illegible]ression before us, so very far from being astonished at the resistance and detestation shewn by the Spaniards, we are inclined from an observation of their national character, to believe that their future efforts will correspond with their present exertion; and if they fall, which we are now far from apprehending, they will fall with our admiration and regret, and with the conviction that their struggle would be probably the last against the most outrageous system of usurpation ever imposed on mankind.

As every day raises this magnanimous people in our opinion, let us, instead of indulging ourselves in a pompous enumeration of their prowess and high spirit, examine how they may be efficaciously assisted.

A very fortunate circumstance for the Spaniards is the extent of the French conquests, not one of which can be abandoned, without producing events similar to those which have occurred in Spain. Another circumstance, equally important, is, that the French Army is not near so numerous, as is commonly supposed. In asserting that it does not amount to 250,000, exclusive of the auxiliaries, we are confident that our assertion cannot be satisfactorily refuted. Let us now examine how many Bonaparte can safely employ beyond the Pyrenees.

As long as we keep from ten thousand to fifteen thousand men in Sicily, he will be obliged to have at least 25,000 men in the Kingdom of Naples; and in consequence of the fermentation which reigns in every part of Italy, he must have 15,000 in Tuscany and the Roman State. It is probable he will find it expedient not to diminish the corps of Davoust, in Poland, which has the double object, of awing Russia and menacing Austria. The corps in Silesia is scarce sufficient to occupy the numerous fortresses in that country. It may not be unnecessary to observe at the same time, that a considerable part of this force consists of his German Allies, who, in case of a new continental war, will not oppose any cordial assistance to Austria; whilst the army under the command of Marmont will probably remain in Dalmatia, in order to support his intrigues in Turkey, and for the purpose of intimidating the Court of Vienna. Without the most imminent danger he cannot withdraw a single regiment from the corps of Bernadotte; for there is every reason to believe that the Hanoverians, and the provinces composing the new Kingdom of Westphalia, are not disinclined to follow the example of the Spanish nation. And if the detestation, which the Brabanters and Dutch feel against the French, be considered, it may be presumed that Bonaparte will not leave those countries in a defenceless state.

Under this point of view, there is no possibility of his being able to employ a hundred thousand men against Spain. And are these sufficient for the subjugation of that country and of Portugal? They certainly are not. He will be either reduced to the necessity of dividing this army into four or five different corps, in order to secure their subsistence; or he must keep them in one or two armies, by which means the difficulty of providing provisions will be encreased; and should they penetrate from one extremity of Spain to the other, he must leave in every province he overruns from twenty to thirty thousand, if he wishes to secure his conquests. If he will expect any favorable result, he must divide his army; and of the danger of such an expedient, the fate of Dupont's corps will convince him.

Another considerable disadvantage for the enemy is, their not being able to employ a numerous cavalry, from a scarcity of forage; for in the middle of May all the vegetation of the Champaign country is burned up by the excessive heat. To what extremities this will reduce his foraging parties may be easily conceived. From the same phisical cause they will not even be able to employ that tremendous train of artillery, which has had so decisive an influence in all their wars. In fact there is not one country in Europe, where a numerous invading army has greater obstacles to surmount, and less probability of success, if the inhabitants are determined to resist.

Let us now examine what assistance this country can render the Spaniards, under a military point of view. We will not advert to the number it may be expedient to send to their assistance; nor will attempt to discover the destination of the expeditions fitting out. But if we make a judicious use of the military positions we have in the Mediterranean, we can always make an important diversion, on several sides, in their favour. We can render them, at the same time, a passive assistance, which may be as efficacious as the most active co-operation on our part. We need only collect the greater part of our regular troops now in England, and encamp them opposite Holland or Brabant, with a sufficient number of transports always in readiness, and the French will be compelled to keep 50,000 men to protect the menaced points; whilst the uncertainty of our attack increases their alarm and augments our aggressive means. We should occasionally embark eight or ten thousand, and annoy the French coasts, which will keep them in continual anxiety from the apprehension of our making a descent. But we must not confine ourselves to idle demonstrations. Whenever a favourable opportunity offers, we should effect a landing, ravage the country, carry off the cattle, and lay the whole coast from Calais to Marseilles under contribution. This proposal may be repugnant to the conscientious and humane; but they do not reflect that false principles of humanity, in a crisis like the present, are attended with more fatal consequences, and more destructive to mankind, than the most barbarous mode of warfare. For the French, during a great part of the war, having suffered no direct losses, and having consequently escaped the pressure of the calamities they have brought on other states, are more indifferent as to its continuance. They have at present no plausible pretext of murmuring against, or resisting the pernicious ambition of the tyrant who oppresses them. But were they to feel in their own houses, or in their own fields, the distresses alluded to above; were they to be spectators of the devastation of their own country, they would raise such cries, as would have more effect in restraining the ambition of Bonaparte, than perhaps any other event which could occur. It may be objected, that this vigorous retaliation would only tend to increase the animosity which subsists between the two countries. We will not answer this objection by asking if the French would act in the same manner towards us, had they it in their power.—They certainly would. But as the people of this country are not in the habit of justifying their actions by the example of that unprincipled and restless nation, we will rather defend it on the expediency of disgusting them, by the misery they will suffer themselves, of their tame acquiescence in the most flagitious projects of their master. They are heartily tired, there is no doubt, of the oppression they labour under. The calamities they would suffer from this new mode of warfare would probably increase their hatred of us; but they would convince them at the same time, more forcibly than any other circumstance, of the ruinous consequences of their abject submission to an immoral tyrant.

We should, however, make a difference between herself and the states she conquered. Our descent be confined totally to the former; and by this and humane discrimination, we should impress on of the French, that we were their enemies from motive, but because they were the common every other state.

All this time we have only adverted to the assis Spaniards have to expect from this country. L turn our attention to the continent. We the Austria awaking from her lethargy. Every acc Germany and Holland inclines us to believe she neglect the favourable opportunity. She has the and fate of Prussia before her. In recruiting he she increases the anxiety and difficulties of B who will never pardon, should he succeed again her troublesome and dangerous neutrality. But to reason to believe that the Cabinet of Vienna is to her true interests. The Archduke Charles, wh sidered by every patriot in Germany, as the last Austrian, and even German, independence, is lightened to overlook the present advantages. H patriotism, and abilities as statesman and general ther sufficiently known, nor appreciated in this He possesses a decided influence over the min countrymen. He is equally loved by the Hunga Bohemian, the Austrian, and the Moravian; an dier has always felt, and acknowledges the effec humane solicitude.

The new arrangement of the Austrian army is n It is divided into ten corps in imitation of the Fren command of the respective corps is given to gener tinguished abilities and great experience. GERMANY.

NA, JUNE 22.—It is said, that our army, on account great Autumn manœuvres, is to be divided into five which are to be commanded by the Archduke Charles, nd Ferdinand, Prince Lichtenstein, and Count Belle- Prince Metternich has repaired to his estates in Swabia, ence he goes to Ludwigsburg, and afterwards to Paris.

KS OF THE ELBE, JUNE 24.—The rumours of a prob- ture, and a new war between Austria and France, be- ily more general: and it is said that the Emperor is not pleased with the late changes in Spain and Italy, made complaints with respect to them. In the mean French armies still occupy the following geographical s against the Austrian Monarchy on its northern frontiers, Silesia are stationed the corps formerly commanded by s Ney, Massena, and Mortier, besides the major part Duke of Berg's cavalry: farther to the North, in the of Warsaw and the territory of Dantzic, Marshal Da- he Polish and Saxon auxiliaries, and the grenadiers and rs of Gen. Oudinot; to the North-West, the corps of s Soult and Victor; the front of the Austrian monarchy, est, is only occupied by the troops of the Rhenish ration; in the South-West, towards Hungary, is Gen. t's corps; in Dalmatia, and in the South, the new of Italy, and several French divisions.

SWEDEN.

KHOLM, JUNE 27.—Last Friday arrived here, in the , some small ships, with wounded people from the ex- under Vegesack, which had been in a severe engage- th the Russians in the neighbourhood of Abo, the issue proved unsuccessful to us. It seems that the Russian those parts was stronger than was expected, and that ons who made their escape from that part of Finland, resented such an enterprise as too easily to be effected. ssians were far superior in number to our troops, and rovided with artillery; yet they were three times at- y the Swedes, and twice driven back, though new re- ents from Abo every time enabled them to rally again. rd battalion of the Feucibles, whose Chief was the nt Colonel Reutercrona, fought with the greatest ar- d seeing the Russians, with charged bayonets, coming hill in a superior number upon them, they ceased firing, and advanced to receive the Russians in the same man- ner: they were attacked, when a terrible carnage began. Lieu- tenant-Colonel Reutercrona was severely wounded in the right arm, which failing, he continued to command with his sword in his left, till weakened by pain and loss of blood, he fell, and was carried off the field. The shot took near the shoulder, and an amputation being deemed necessary, his life is considered in great danger.

The Russians, it is certain, are retiring from the North of Finland. This morning, about one o'clock, a courier arrived with the news that Gamely Carleby is evacuated by the Rus- sians.

FROM THE LOWER ELBE, JUNE 22.—All the French troops have evacuated the Island of Fuhnen, and entrusted its defence to the Spanish troops, under the command of the Mar- quis de la Romane. In those districts, there are not more than two Officers of the Etât-Major of the Prince de Ponte Corvo. The Regiment of the Prince of Asturias is in Zealand. Hitherto nothing of importance has occurred. The English are said to have already penetrated the White Sea, with a view to block- ade Archangel, in order to prevent the transport of provisions to Norway.

RUSSIA.

ST. PETERSBURGH, JUNE 12.—Our Court Gazette contains a report of an action fought near Ravolax, in Finland, on the 28th of April, in which our troops were taken by surprise by the Swedes. Our loss consists of 500 men and four pieces of cannon. General Buxhovden ascribes this unfortunate accident to the badly contrived measures of the General of Division who commanded there. He therefore proceeded to the place in per- son.

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

SPAIN.

MADRID, JUNE 15.—We are much relieved here by the di- minution of the French troops, and particularly as the few which remain do not at all interfere with us. In the gardens of the Retiro, they go on with their fortifications. Scarcely a soul is to be seen on the public walk of the Prado, on account of the hor- rid scenes so lately exhibited there.

It is said, that Murat is ordered to return to France, in con- sequence of having acted with too much remissness and too little severity, and that in place of him we are to receive Massena, who is more active and much more sanguinary.

MANZANARES, JUNE 12.—The division of Dupont, which consisted of 12,000 men, in its progress to Andalusia, was at- tacked on the 8th, between the Venta de Cardenas and the road to Despena-perros, where 4,000 irregular troops were posted. They permitted the first and second column to pass unmolested, but fell upon the third, and not a single man escaped. The rear-guard, composed of 1,000 dragoons and others, fell back upon Valdepenas, where they met with many misfortunes. Another corps of 740 Frenchmen came hither, where they were received by the armed people; and as they were fatigued, and few in number, they surrendered themselves prisoners, and were sent into the interior.

The day before yesterday the two first divisions were attack- ed, not being able to proceed further than the bridge of Guadal- quivir, which was broken down. They were there attacked, and those who were not killed were made prisoners. Much French blood was shed, but on our part little loss was sustained. Dupont is among the prisoners.

It is likewise said, that Valencia has entered into a Treaty with the English; and that in consequence on the 9th, the troops which were in Majorca, and the adjacent Islands, were disem- barked at Valencia, and, at the same time, a thousand muskets with a quantity of ammunition. The English have offered to return with further assistance.

They add further, that the advanced troops of the Valencians were at Abazéte, and these with the Murcian troops, will com- pose a force of 184,000 men, with a formidable train of artil- lery. It is mentioned that Moncey, whose intention it was to occupy the province of Valencia, has not ventured to quit Min- granella.

OVIEDO, JUNE 22.—The contents of various letters received here on the 20th, concur in refuting the Madrid Diario of the 15th, which positively states, that Dupont had triumphantly entered Cordova: the fact being, that after his advanced guard, consisting of a numerous corps of cavalry, had passed on far as Anduxar, the main body of his army was cut to pieces, between Baylen and that place; and, subsequently, his advanced guard met the same fate, between Anduxur and Cordova.

The general discomfiture of the French in Portugal is confirmed from all quarters.

JUNE 29.—Letters from Madrid state, that the French General Le Febre de Nattes has been routed by the troops of Arragon, between Mallen and Gallen, with his division of 6,000 men; that General Renna or Renner, who was marching with a division of 3,000 men to reinforce Dupont, had also been defeated; that the French in the vicinity of Tudela were annihilated after the action of the 9th; that General Savary occupied the Royal Palace; that Murat remained indisposed at Charnartin; and that the works at Retino were going on with, the artillery to supply them being taken from Segovia and Aranjuez.

IMPORTANT SPANISH DOCUMENTS.

The Supreme Council of Government has communicated to the Council of this City, an Edict, which is of the following tenor:—

EDICT.

DON FERDINAND VII. KING OF SPAIN AND THE INDIES, AND IN HIS NAME THE SUPREME COUNCIL OF GOVERNMENT OF BOTH.

In order to carry into full effect the Declaration of War against the Emperor Napoleon I. decrees as follows:—

I. Within four days from the publication hereof, every French man, or person who has served under the French banners, and is desirous to enjoy the advantages of the Spanish service, shall present himself in this capital at the Chamberlain's Office, and make his declaration: and, after having taken the oath of allegiance, he shall remain free from all molestation, and enjoy all the privileges which pertain to him. And the same shall be done in all other places and cities, and attended to either by the Boards of Government or Common Council, where the former shall not yet have been formed.

II. Every Frenchman, or other person, who has served under the banners of that nation, and shall not present himself within four days, as aforesaid, shall be considered as a person desirous of remaining perfectly French; and all his property, of whatever nature or description it may be, shall be confiscated.

III. All merchants, and all other persons who have in their possession, on any ground or title whatever, any goods, claims, or effects belonging to Frenchmen, or to persons who have served under the French banners, shall keep them in their possession, and not dispose of them on pain of being accountable for the same; and they shall within four days make a declaration upon oath of the said goods, claims, and effects, and deliver it to our Board of Exchequer, and all persons who offend against this order, shall be prosecuted according to law.

Given in the Royal Palace of Alcazas, in Seville, the 7th June, 1808.—By command of the Supreme Council, JUAN BAUTISTA PARDO, Sec.

MANUEL MARIA AGUILAR, Sec.

And in obedience to the said supreme injunction, the Council of this place orders the same to be published and posted in the usual places, and give notice that the Committee appointed for that purpose shall acquaint the Frenchmen who reside here, with the day when they are to make their appearance, and comply with the said supreme injunction.

Don JUAN DE LA VERA P. SANTANDER, 2d Sec.

ADDRESS OF THE GOVERNMENT TO THE INHABITANTS OF CADIZ.

The French Squadron has surrendered at discretion, relying on the humanity and generosity of the inhabitants of Cadiz, as has already been made known. The measures which have been pursued, have prevented our squadron from sustaining the least damage, nor have the forces employed to reduce the French squadron sustained any considerable loss, and the effusion of blood has been less than in a combat of two small armed vessels; the loss in killed does not exceed four men. The French ships, their arms, and warlike stores, remain at our disposal, and the prisoners taken will be exchanged for our troops. Nothing of that kind could have been attained by red-hot balls, or similar means. Had no measures of prevention been taken, which require time, our loss would have been much greater. I therefore trust I have acquitted myself in a manner worthy of the inhabitants of this town, who have given me so many repeated proofs of their confidence and respect, that I shall at all times entertain the highest sense of the approbation with which they have honoured my conduct.

But now I demand, exact, and ordain, that all dist shall cease; that every thing shall return to order; that sons, according to their different ranks and stations, sh mit to the Constituted Authorities, who all depend fro preme Council of Government, at all times solicitous to the public welfare, and to procure the best alliances a secure a successful issue of our undertaking: Let reign, and all arbitrary proceedings be avoided. The lightened and civilized people only disgraces itself by ing the death of any individual. The field of battle, wh is repelled by force, authorises alone the effusion which is otherwise illegal. The Sovereign himself is n of the life of an offender, unless he has forfeited the sa laws of his country.

These laws prohibit in all countries, even among barbarous nations, sedition and disturbances of every tion; we are bound to obey and respect them. This i means to secure a successful issue of the contest in whi engaged, and not to offend either against the God of the Sovereign, whose sacred rights we have sworn to

In order to avoid an unnecessary multiplication of tos, I now address the French, who reside in this c upreme Council has used towards you the utmost expect; after having taken the oath of fidelity to th Nation, you are permitted to remain in this country, property is respected. Grateful for this valuable ble should not be vipers, which destroy the bosom that shelter. On the contrary you are bound to shew loyalty and respect for a Government which treats generous a manner; by such conduct you will not the odium of the good inhabitants of this town, but their love. Should you act otherwise dread their ju will punish with the utmost rigour, and without the le even meetings which you may hold among yourselves loyal expressions which you may make use of in opp our cause. Should any one of you be so far devoid o not to respect it on account of its equity and justice, l a victim of his wickedness or pride.

MESSINA, JUNE 20.—On the 13th instant arrived here his Excellency Sir John Stuart, Commander in Chief of the British army in the Mediterranean. His excellency was greeted with every demonstration of joy. Upon his landing he was saluted by the fort at Porta Real, with 19 pieces of cannon.—Sir J. Stuart has not only assumed the general command of all the British forces in the Mediterranean, but the army also of his Sicilian Majesty, it is understood, has been offered to be united with our own, under his orders, with the rank of Captain-General.

GIBRALTAR.

From the Gibraltar Chronicle of June 18.—Notice to the Public.—For the satisfaction of the public, that all may know the real extent of the kind of misfortune which has befallen our troops at Cordova, and that it entirely arises from the circumstance, that the troops composed of inhabitants did not fight so brave as they ought to have done; since, had they acquitted themselves properly, the French army would have been completely destroyed, and that the people may thereby be excited to wipe off this trifling blot from their 'scutcheon, by their ardour and steadiness in the field. This Supreme Board of Government orders the publication of the two following letters; one of which is from the Officer commanding the van, confidently expecting, and enjoining every one for the safety of the country, to display, in such actions as may be fought for the future, the discipline, vigour, and steadiness, which have ever been characteristic of true Spaniards, and which are so necessary under the existing critical circumstances when they become an imperious duty.

"MOST SERENE SIR—The Reverend Anthony Cabreros, a clergyman, who had at Cordova the management of the telegraph which had just been destoyed, presents himself before the Board at three in the morning, and relates that at two in the afternoon the French began to batter and force the new gate of the said town, and that the action commenced about four in the morning, all the Officers agreeing that if the armed inhabitants had kept their ground, though even so short a time, no trace would have been left of the French. The troops of the line have distinguished themselves, and more especially the provincial grenadiers, and their Commander, D'Hear Maria d'Moreles. The Staff, with a considerable part of the army under Echavarri, remains at Thru, in Mengo Negro, with a great quantity of ammunition and ordnance, one piece of cannon excepted, which is said to be left behind in consequence of the carriage having been broken; which account, signed by the Clergyman, is thus laid before your Highness for the corresponding purposes—May God preserve you.

back to this town at half past eleven at night, to wait for your further orders. The action, which had been doubtful for two hours, was decided in favour of the enemy, by the precipitate flight of the armed inhabitants, whom I found it impossible to keep in their ranks. The pass of the bridge of Alecolea was gloriously defended both by our artillery and the brave Lafala, who had under his orders at Campo Mayor, 100 volunteers and provincial grenadiers. I can assure your Highness, the pass cost the enemy upwards of 200 men in killed and wounded, and that the rencounter with our cavalry cost them as many. For our part, I will send positive intelligence to your Highness as soon as I receive the returns from the respective Commandants of Corps—In the mean while, from those in my hands, and from what I have seen, I am convinced that the number of both will not amount to thirty.

STATE PAPER.

ANSWER OF HIS EMINENCE CARDINAL GABRIELLI, FIRST SECRETARY OF STATE TO THE NOTE OF HIS EXCELLENCY M. CHAMPAGNY, ADDRESSED TO M. LE FEVRE, CHARGE D'AFFAIRES FROM THE EMPEROR OF FRANCE, DATED APRIL 19, 1808.

"After your Excellency had made known to the Holy Father, that it was the decided wish of his Majesty the Emperor and King, that he should enter into an offensive and defensive league with the other Powers of Italy, as had been declared by M. Champagny to the Cardinal Caprara, by note of the 3d current, the dispatch of the said Cardinal has been received, which brought the original note of the above Minister.

"The Holy Father, after having attentively read and considered the said document, has ordered Cardinal Gabrielli, First Secretary of State, to make known to your Excellency his Holiness's sentiments on its contents; beginning with that which forms the cardinal point among all the others. His Holiness has seen with pain, that even the final proposition therein contained, of the offensive and defensive league, should be accompanied with the threat of depriving him of his temporal dominions in case of his non-compliance. If worldly considerations had at all influenced the conduct of the Holy Father, he would from the first have yielded to the wish of his Majesty, and not have exposed himself to suffer so many calamities; but the Holy Father is regulated alone by the consideration due to his duty and his conscience: both have prevented him from agreeing to the Federation, and they equally hinder him from consenting to the offensive and defensive league, which differs but in name; its nature, however, does not except any Prince, to whom the Pope, according to the circumstances of the times, might not become an enemy.

"His Holiness feels, moreover, that this article, far from improving, detracts from his situation. In the articles presented to Cardinal de Bayan, the Federation was proposed as alone against heretics and the English. But this is couched in general terms, pointing out no people as an enemy, yet excluding no government, no nation, from the contingency of becoming one. If, then, his Holiness declined from conscientious motives to be a party to that Federation, so is he equally withheld from this league. The Holy Father would not merely bind himself to a defence, but to an aggression. Then would be seen the Minister of the God of Peace placing himself in a state of perpetual warfare; then would be seen their common Father in arms against his children, and the Head of the Church exposing himself, by his own act, to a deprivation of his spiritual connections with the Catholics of those Powers against which the league would make it imperative on him to act hostilely. How then can his Holiness shake off his power and natural character, and sacrifice as must be the consequence, the interests of Religion!

"His Holiness, unlike other Princes, is invested with a two-fold character, namely, of Sovereign Pontiff, and of temporal Sovereign, and has given repeated evidence that he cannot, by virtue of this second qualification, enter upon engagements which would lead to results militating against his first and most important office, and injuring the religion of which he is the head, the Propagator, and the Avenger. His Holiness, therefore, cannot enter into any offensive and defensive league, which would, by a permanent and progressive system, drag him into hostility against all those powers upon which his Majesty may think proper to make war; since the Italian States, so dependent upon his Majesty, can never avoid taking part in wars. His Holiness would consequently be obliged to become a party in them by virtue of this league. Such an engagement must begin to be acted upon by the Pope from this moment against any Catholic Prince; thus waging war against him without a motive. Farther, it must be waged against all powers, whether Catholic or not, who may, upon what grounds, be the enemies of any Italian Prince.

"Thus is the Head of the Church, accustomed as he is in his estates in peace, driven in a moment to a state of war, offensive against hostile powers, and defensive of the same. This engagement is too repugnant to the sacred duties of his office, and too injurious to the interests of religion, to be entered into by the head of that religion. His Holiness feels that it would be a dereliction of truth, to enter into the league: he must announce, by such a resolution, his refusal of any accommodation, any peace with the Emperor, and would even declare hostilities against him. How could it ever be supposed, that his Holiness should be capable of declaring war against any power? He has long been enduring the most hostile treatment, and is therefore prepared to endure the threatened loss of his temporal dominions.

"Heaven is witness of the purity of his Holiness's intentions, and the world will judge if it was possible to have conceived an extraordinary a scheme. Ardently desiring to compromise matters, to be in peace with his Majesty, he manifested, in his letter of the 28th of January last, his compliance, as far as it was possible to comply; his Majesty, however, does not practise any condescensions, which he might practise towards the Holy See; he persists inflexibly in demanding what his Holiness neither will accede to, namely, to binding him to a war, a perpetual and aggressive war, under the pretence of securing the tranquillity of Italy. What can Italy have to fear, if his Holiness should not enter into the proposed league?

"Surrounded as the Papal Dominions are by those of his Majesty, no rational fear could be entertained but of the sea; yet his Holiness having offered to shut them during the present war against the enemies of France, and to guard the coasts thus proposed to contribute as far as was in his power, without betraying his sacred duties, to the security and tranquillity of Italy. If, in spite of all this, his Majesty shall take possession, as he has threatened, of the Papal Dominions, respected even by the most powerful monarchy, during a space of ten centuries and upwards, and shall overturn the Government, his Holiness will be unable to prevent this spoilation, and can only, in bitter affliction of heart, lament the evil which his Majesty will commit in the sight of God; trusting in whose protection his Holiness will remain in perfect tranquillity, enjoying the consciousness of not having brought on this disaster by imprudence or by obstinacy, but to preserve the independence of the sovereignty which he ought to transmit uninjured to his successor as he received it; and to maintain in its integrity that system which may secure the universal concurrence of all Princes necessary to the welfare of religion. For this fidelity to his sacred duties, his Holiness will receive consolation from the words of his Divine Master, 'Blessed are they who are persecuted for righteousness' sake.'

"With respect to the article relating to the dismissal of the Cardinals, his Holiness, in the complaints alleged, had a right of examining the principle of their allegiance. Presuming that freedom which the rights of nations allow to every one to live under that sky which is most congenial to him; pronouncing on that new allegiance acquired by the domicile of many years, his Holiness remarks, that primitive allegiance cannot cease against the sacred obligations undertaken by the Cardinals of the Church of God, the oaths they take on receiving the purple, and their eminent office of Councillors to the Sovereign Pontiff in his spiritual concerns; and that, therefore, they cannot be torn from his bosom.

"With regard to the cessation of the functions of the Cardinals and to his departure, his Holiness could hardly have expected that they would have been attributed to the motives assigned in Champigny's Note. His Holiness will repeat them once more. After having tried every method to recall his Majesty to his previous sentiments towards the Papal See, and to obtain the desired reparation of so many religious innovations, having endured, for such a length of time, with unsubdued patience, and with unalterable meekness, so many outrages and insults; after having seen how fruitless were all the remonstrances urged against the hostile proceedings of the Imperial s not, therefore, his Holiness, who by this hypothetical f his Legate, has declared war against the Emperor; it is peror who chooses to declare war against his Holiness; content to declare war against his temporal Sovereignty, ntens to raise in his spiritual, a wall of division between holics of France and the Sovereign Pontiff, in the assur cording to Champagny's Note, that the Cardinal Legat given up his functions, the Gallican Church resumes its in all its integrity.

PROVINCIALS.

BRIGHTON, JULY 9.—Our races are at length fixed; there will be four days sport as usual, beginning on Tuesday the 2d of August; and if we may judge from the number of horses entered, there will in all probability, be more sport than has been for some years past.

A NEW MODE OF POUNDING PIGS.—The following is given as a specimen of a pig fancier: A small grunter, the property of a publican in Manchester, on one of the late race days, strayed near one of the sacred edifices, a church; the sexton, no doubt with the purest intention, though without warrant or mittimus, lodged the profane trespasser a prisoner in the church steeple, till a more convenient opportunity, when he might remove him by habeas corpus. As the swinish multitude (according to Mr. Burke) are a little tenacious of their liberty, so it happened in this instance: the poor prisoner not only made a lusty outcry, but thrust his anti-mosaic carcase through one of the orifices of the belfry, and, like thousands of the world fell a sacrifice to his struggles for freedom, fatally tumbling upon some iron spikes beneath.

REMARKABLE CIRCUMSTANCE.—There is at present at a farm-house in the neighbourhood of Dumfries, a turkey hen, that has brought up for these two months past, twelve young powts, and is now sitting upon some eggs for the purpose of bringing out a new brood; but what is remarkable, the turkey cock has taken charge of the first brood, which he covers with his wings at intervals in the day and during the night, with the greatest care and attention.

A curious circumstance occurred one day last week at Chailey, near Lewes. A crow having settled at the brink of a pond, near the garden of Mr. Kemp, shop-keeper, of that place, got entangled, as he supposed by an eel, when Mr. K. took his gun and shot at them; upon taking up the crow, he found he had also killed a snake of 18 inches in length, which had wound itself round the crow, and was in the act of devouring it at the time.

TUESDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

Downing-street, July 12, 1808.

Dispatches, of which the following are extracts, have been received from Major-General Spencer, by Viscount Castlereagh, one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State.

Extract of a Dispatch from Major-Gen. Spencer to Viscount Castlereagh, dated on board his Majesty's Ship Windsor Castle, off Ayamonte, June 17, 1808.

MY LORD—I avail myself of the opportunity afforded by the passing of the Nautilus, from Lord Collingwood to Sir Charles Cotton, to congratulate your Lordship on the Surrender of the French Squadron, of five line of battle ships and one frigate, in the harbour of Cadiz, to the Spanish arms, on the 14th instant, on which day the Spanish colours were flying in all the French ships. The particulars of this important and interesting event will, no doubt, be fully communicated to your Lordship by Lord Collingwood.

It is also very satisfactory for me to inform your Lordship, that the movement I have made to this quarter, at the request of General Morla, has been attended with the happiest effects. The French troops are retiring in every direction, towards Lisbon, except some very insignificant parties left to occupy the different small forts and posts on this side of Portugal. The Portuguese people are rising in all parts, encouraged greatly by our presence here; and the Spanish frontier on the Guadiana is thus effectually secured from any attack of the French.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Extract of a Dispatch from Major-General Spencer to Viscount Castlereagh, dated on board his Majesty's brig Scout, off Lagos, June 21, 1808.

MY LORD—The French Fleet having surrender on the 14th, and the British Commissioners having since embarked for England, I beg leave shortly to recapitulate the different events which have led to these desirable objects, and to state to your Lordship the present situation of Spain and Portugal, as far as I have obtained correct information.

The general feeling of the Spaniards had been for some time excited to the utmost degree of indignation at the conduct of the French. The information of the forced renunciation of the Crown of Spain by Charles the Fourth, Ferdinand, and all the Royal Family, in favour of Bonaparte, appeared to signal of universal opposition to the views of Fran-

The Council of Seville, one of the principal provincial jurisdictions in Spain, have laid hold of some statutes in their Constitution, which authorize their rejecting the orders of the Supreme Council of Madrid when that capital shall be in the power of foreign troops. They have therefore assumed an independent authority in the name of Ferdinand the Seventh, whom they have proclaimed King; and after some previous steps, they have formally declared war against France, and have appealed to the Spanish nation to support them; and their supremacy has been acknowledged by the Councils of several other Provinces.

In Andalusia they collected from fifteen to twenty thousand regular troops, and have put arms in the hands of upwards of sixty thousand peasants. General Castaneos is appointed Commander in Chief: and I understand they propose out of the first levies, to augment the establishment of the old regiments, to double their present numbers.

Provincial Assemblies are also forming in most of the large towns, and different depôts fixed upon for raising volunteers.

They have a porportion of near four thousand cavalry, and a large quantity of artillery, as Seville is a foundery, and one of the largest depôts in Spain.

All accounts agree, that in every part of Spain the insurrection have commenced almost at the same period; many small detachments of the enemy, and many officers, have been cut off.

General Dupont was on his march to Seville, and had already passed the Morena mountains when the insurrection took place. He has pushed on to Cordova, and, by the intercepted dispatches, we learn he is strengthening himself there, and proposes to wait for reinforcements. In the mean time, the Morena passes in his rear have been occupied by five thousand Spaniards, the road has been broken up; and, I trust, all communication has been cut off.

General D'Alrid had received orders to join him at Seville, with four thousand men, who were to assemble at Alcorentin, but our arrival off Ayamonte, and the arming of all Spain, and the alarms in Portugal, having prevented this movement, I trust that General Junot will not now be able to detach any troops from Portugal, though we understand a French corps has been collected at Elvas, but I do not think it can exceed 4000 men, though the reports of its strength are very various.

At Faro the Portuguese have already risen, have taken or destroyed a detachment of about two hundred men, have seized the arms and ammunition of the province, which the French had collected in a dépôt, and also about forty thousand dollars in gold, which the French General had amassed.

Extract of a Letter from Vice-Admiral Lord Collingwood, Commander in Chief of His Majesty's Ships and Vessels in the Mediterranean, to the Honourable W. W. Pole, dated Ocean, off Cadiz, June 14, 1808.

Sir—In my letter of the 12th instant, by the Alphea, I informed you that application had been made for a ship to carry to England Commissioners appointed by the Supreme Council of Seville, to treat with his Majesty's Ministers on such matters as are important to the interest of both countries. The Admiral who commands in the Port of Cadiz being one of the deputed, they did not choose he should depart until the surrender of the French ships, which took place this morning.

The Spaniards having constructed an additional battery of thirty heavy guns, and numerous gun and bomb vessels having taken their stations, the French ships struck their colours at seven o'clock this morning, and soon after the Spanish were hoisted on board them. The French ships, I understand, are not at all injured, as the Spaniards wanted them for their own use; nor has there been much loss of men on either side.

The Governor some days since (and before I came here) requested of Major-General Spencer to proceed to Ayamonte, to oppose a detachment of the French army, which was said to be marching from Portugal by the Coast; and yesterday the transports proceeded, under the protection of the Zealous, to that quarter, where the Windsor Castle had conducted a detachment the day before.

June 15.—The Governor of Cadiz has notified to me, that the Commissioners will be ready to embark in two days. As the Revenge has been stationed near the town, where Sir John Gore has had much intercourse with the Governor and Chiefs in command during the late operations, and witnessed the temper and disposition of the people, I have ordered that ship to receive them, that he may give to his Majesty's Ministers the information they may desire of what has come within his observation as to the present state of this part of Spain.

His Majesty's Ship Cossack, off Saint Andero, June 25, 1808.

My Lord,—The last opportunity I had of writing to your lordship, I acquainted you of my intention to go to St. Andero immediately and afford every assistance in my power to the loyal inhabitants, and bring off any British subjects that might wish to come away, in the present uncertain state of the country; and I had intelligence that the French frigate in Passage, accompanied by several gun-boats, was expected to make a descent on that part of the coast; owing to the strong easterly winds, and long calms, I did not get there till the 21st. The signal-post displayed a flag of truce, which was answered by both ships. The Captain of the Port, Don Vincento Carmino, came on board; he told us the French army was soon expected to make an attack on the pass of the mountains that guarded the approach to the town; he invited us to anchor in Sardenero Bay, which we did at five P. M.; until he had made his report to the Bishop, who was the present Governor, he wished us not to land. No boat returning by one o'clock the next day, I concluded some sudden attack, or unexpected event must have taken place. In the afternoon a brig came out of the harbour full of people of all descriptions, who had left the town on the report that the French were advancing. I immediately got under weigh, and sent Captain Daly, of the Comet, up the harbour, to gain some confirmed intelligence, and should the report prove true, to reconnoitre the fort, and find out where the principal magazine was, and, if it was possible, to destroy it. Between eight and nine, P. M. Captain Daly returned with certain information, that the French army had gained the pass, and had halted only a few miles from the town, and were expected to enter that night or next day.

Captain Daly also made every possible observation, and had himself spiked the guns in two forts near the town, and he requested to go and destroy the magazine, and the guns in the forts that guard the entrance of the harbour. I should certainly have sent the boats that night, but the great chance of their being taken by surprise, should the enemy advance, and the night being dark and squally, with every appearance of bad weather, made me defer it till next morning; at day-light we stood into the bay, and manned and armed two boats from each ship, under the orders of Captain Daly; he was accompanied by Lieutenant H. M. Herbert, of the Cossack, and Lieutenant Read, of the Royal Marines, and several of the younger officers, who all volunteered their services; they left this ship soon after six o'clock, and landed about eight, spiked all the guns in Fort St. Salvador de Ano, and Fort Sedra, and wedged shot in the chambers of them, which renders them quite useless; the magazine was at some little distance, and had five hundred whole barrels of powder in it, besides quantities of other stores; all which was completely destroyed, great part by throwing it over the cliffs into the sea, leaving sufficient to blow up the magazine; the train was laid for a considerable distance, and it was let off about ten o'clock, which instantly levelled the whole building to the ground; finding some more powder in Fort Sedra, a train was laid to it, which took effect, and blew part of the house and storehouse in it up; the two other forts on the west side of the bay they could not attempt, as the surf was so high it was impossible to land, and to walk round was too far from the boats, as they had not a moment to spare; having heard before they set fire to the first train, that the French had entered the town, and they expected a strong guard at the forts; the boats left the shore by eleven o'clock, and had just got round the Point of De Ano, when a considerable body of French dragoons appeared on the hill, and took post near the smoaking ruins of the magazine. I am sorry to say, Captain Daly, and Lieutenant Read of the Marines, are much scorched, particularly Lieutenant read, in setting fire to the last train, but am happy to find his eyes are safe, and he is doing well. Captain Daly speaks in high commendation of the zeal and exertion of every officer and man employed with him.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Copy of a Letter from the Hon. Captain Dundas, of his Majesty's ship Euryalus, to Captain Graves, of the Brunswick, and transmitted by Vice-Admiral Sir James Saumarez to the Hon. W. W. Pole.

His Majesty's ship Euryalus, in the Great Belt, June 12, 1808.

Sir,—After having seen the convoy clear, I proceeded in company with his Majesty's sloop Cruizer, and late yesterday evening discovered several vessels at anchor near the entrance of the Naskon, very close to the shore. We anchored at dark, and I sent Lieutenant Head, with the boats of this ship and Cruizer (four in number) to destroy them; and it is with great pleasure I have to inform you, he executed this service with his usual bravery and judgment, by burning two large vessels fitted for the reception of troops, capturing a gun-vessel of the largest dimensions, mounting two eighteen pounders, and having sixty-four men on board, moored within half pistol-shot of a battery of three eighteen pounders, and the shore lined with troops. Although the enemy defended themselves well, we had but one man slightly wounded; their loss was great, seven killed, and twelve wounded, with many drowned; and they must have suffered on shore by the fire from our boats.

I beg leave to mention the midshipmen employed, Messrs. Wemyss, Rickets, Yeoman, Richard, and Graymore, of this ship, Moffat and Loveday of the Cruizer, for their good conduct on this occasion, and who are, together with the boats' crews, particularly mentioned by Lieut. Head.

I have the honour to be, &c.

G. H. L. Dundas.

Thomas Graves, Esq. Captain of his Majesty's ship Brunswick.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

BRITISH EXPEDITION.

Ve expected to have been able to inform our readers of departure of the expedition, under the command of ARTHUR WELLESLEY, but unfortunately our expectas have been disappointed. What can be the cause of delay we know not. From the importance of its tination it would be supposed that no time should be . Or, are Ministers willing to hear of some signal cess on the part of the gallant Spaniards before the edition be allowed to sail? Or, are they uncertain whether hall proceed to Sicily, in preference to Portugal or in. Whatever be the cause, the delay is shameful, and erves the highest animadversion. In military expedis a few days make an inconceivable difference. It is e hoped this delay has no connection with the differe said to exist in the Cabinet, about the choice of a amander in Chief. So many rumours have been cir ted about this nomination, that it is impossible to it over in silence. According to some the Earl of ATHAM is to command an Expedition of 40,000 men; bt others assert that the Duke of YORK has expressed a re to obtain the Chief Command. We are certain that ther of these rumours are founded on truth; and from favourable opinion we are willing to entertain of ral Members of the Cabinet, we are convinced they never any thing of the kind in agitation. In an Expeon, which is destined to secure the liberties of Europe, to t the Spaniards in repelling their invaders, and by this k of energy on our part, to rouse the Continent from its mber, there is reason to believe that a General, who ore accustomed to service than the Earl of CHATHAM possibly be, will be chosen. So much absolutely ends on the reputation of a Commander in Chief, t the success of an expedition may be said to depend it absolutely. We would willingly ask where the l of CHATHAM has acquired his? Was it in Hyde Park? this subject is really too serious and important in its sequence, to treat it with levity or humour. The Duke ORK, notwithstanding his military abilities and expe-ce, can have no inclination to re-appear on a theatre, ere he has been uniformly unfortunate. There is a fa-ty attached to some men, who, with the best combina-s, and the greatest tactical knowledge, have been al-s beat: such was the case with Admiral COLIGNY, and riably so with KING WILLIAM, whichever he command-gainst the generals of LEWIS XIV. Without derogating he least from the talents and skill of his Royal High-, he is from the same fatality, of his having been al-s unsuccessful, perfectly incompetent for a situation ere fortune is supposed to exercise so much influence. will say no more on this subject at present, because it been communicated as a mere matter of report. But we will give as our decided opinion, that the choice of er his Royal Highness, or the Earl of CHATHAM, will er meet the approbation of the Public.

The accounts from Spain continue to be favourable. The our and patriotism which this brave Nation displays in the assertion of its rights, are greater than we expected from any modern people. Notwithstanding the check which the Patriots received in their first attack of DUPONT, this, so far from discouraging them, had only excited them to more energetic efforts. When we consider their generous endeavours, the more we regret that no effort has been made as yet to effect a diversion in their favour. The exertions of the Portuguese correspond with those of their neighbours. They anxiously wait for the co-operation of an English army. And if our Expedition from Cork be intended for the Tagus, in rescuing an ancient ally from French oppression, we render, at the same time, the most efficacious assistance to the Spaniards.

INSURRECTIONS IN SEVERAL PARTS OF THE CONTINENT.

Accounts have certainly been received, that the most marked disapprobation has been manifested in several parts of France, particularly at Paris, on account of the atrocious occurrences in Spain. In the coffee-houses and theatres, the Parisians are said to have shewn their discontent so strongly, that 20 or 30 persons are arrested every day.—Though the most rigorous precautions may be adopted by the Police; though the press be entirely subservient to the will of the French Government, it is impossible to conceal from the inhabitants the iniquitous proceedings at Bayonne. These events must convince the French, that the plans of BONAPARTE are perfectly incompetent with their happiness and tranquillity. They are still men. They have their individual and national feelings; and when they see a stranger, who has usurped the government of their country, hurrying them on from one iniquitous transaction to another, they must reflect that they are exciting the execration of mankind, and loading themselves with a vast burthen of infamy, for the sole purpose of aggrandizing a stranger and his family.

Advices are said to have been received, that Marshal BRUNE had been arrested at Paris, and sent to the Temple. This arrestation has been occasioned, it is said, by his conduct in Pomerania. According to the same accounts TALLEYRAND has shared his fate. To neither of these reports are we willing to attach much credit. If BONAPARTE had been offended at the conduct of BRUNE, relative to the KING of SWEDEN, he would not have waited twelve months; but would have him arrested immediately after the event. Though we have no doubt of the violence of BONAPARTE, yet we think him possessed of too much prudence to excite the distrust and apprehension of the principal persons attached to his fortunes; which would unavoidably take place, were he guilty of the imprudence of arresting two men, such as TALLEYRAND and BRUNE. Should this event occur, BONAPARTE would not be a single instant secure. As every one about him would be apprehensive of a similar fate, they would soon endeavour to secure their own existence by his destruction.

However, these symptoms of discontent have not appeared among the French alone, they have broken out into absolute resistance in the county of Mark, formerly belonging to the KING of PRUSSIA, and now forming a part of the new Kingdom of Westphalia. A large body of conscripts had been ordered to march towards Spain, they peremptorily refused to obey; and it is stated at the same time, that a detachment of troops, having been sent to reduce them to obedience, would not proceed, as soon as they were informed on what business they were to be employed.

This confirms an opinion we had long entertained, and which we had an opportunity of observing on the Continent, but which we were unwilling to mention from its singularity, that BONAPARTE is far from possessing the affections of the soldiery. The moment he suffers the slightest discomfiture in any of his designs, or the least defeat has weakened their enthusiasm for his military capacity, this disaffection, which is now confined to some petulant remarks and sarcasms, will be soon converted into open disobedience. There are not men wanting in France, both in the Senate and the Army to foment it, as soon as they can do it with any prospect of success. Military adventurers, like Massena and Bernadotte, though they at present cringe to the Usurper, must severely feel the state of insignificance to which the uncontrouled power of Bonaparte has reduced them. Like the companions of Cæsar, they participate in the plunder of the provinces he has conquered: but like them, when an opportunity offers, they will sacrifice him without compunction. There is no measure to the views of ambitious men; though they may content themselves with equality, they are never satisfied as long as another usurps authority over them.

Amongst the variety of subjects, which, in the course of the week, have occupied the attention of the public, none has excited more surprise or more regret, than a reported misunderstanding between the Commanders of our Expedition to the Baltic, and the gallant King of Sweden. After the conduct of that Monarch toward us; after his refusing to enter into any compromise with the enemies of this country; after having hazarded the security of his crown in consequence of his adherence to the common cause of European independence; after the frequent mention made by his Majesty's ministers of his strict adherence to his engagements; shall we give credit to the misunderstanding said to have existed between Sir John Moore and his Majesty.—We would wish, for the honour of our General, and even for the consistency of Ministers, that this disagreeable rumour could only be traced to the inventive heads of some of our journalists. But this entire affair is still so mysterious, that we are absolutely afraid of communicating our sentiments upon it. We would willingly disbelieve it; we would even willingly communicate to the public the reasons we have to discredit it. We will only add, is there any satisfactory communication as yet made to the public, to induce us all at once to renounce the high opinion we are certainly justified in forming of the Swedish Monarch; certainly not. Or, shall we throw the blame on Sir John Moore. This would be both premature and indiscreet before we are better acquainted with the circumstances, than we are as yet from the obscure hints thrown out in some of the daily papers. Should this circumstance however be true, which we sincerely hope is not the case, the strictest scrutiny should be made, every satisfaction given to the gallant Monarch, who came forward in so honourable a manner, in support of the common cause.

This is not, certainly, a moment for our Generals to display their courage or independence, by entering into a dispute with the only ally we had on the Continent. We have already suffered too much from the indiscretion of some; and there is something so repugnant to our feelings, something so ungrateful in the transaction, that we feel strongly inclined to reject it wholly; and to consider it, notwithstanding the variety of channels through which it has been communicated, as an idle or malicious rumour.

TURKISH EMBASSY.

The arrival of two Turkish Envoys has been as unexpected as it is important. Their object is undoubtedly the re-establishment of peace between the two countries. It would be useless to point out the advantages that would result from this event. Exclusive of its opening a new market to our merchants, it will have very considerable effect towards hastening the decision of Austria; which, in case of a war with France, would be exposed to considerable inconvenience, in having in her rear a power absolutely at the discretion of the latter. This important intelligence has been communicated to us in a letter from Plymouth, dated 12th July.

"Late last evening arrived here the Bittern sloop of war, of 18 guns, Capt. Usher, from Malta, Gibraltar, and Vigo, with dispatches of very great importance for Government; after the usual quarantine precautions, the dispatches were landed, as also the persons who were charged with them, viz. their Excellencies Sidky Effendi, and Demetrius Duc, two Turkish Ambassadors; Captain Angelo, of the 21st regiment; A. S. J. Barker, Esq. Secretary to Mr. Adair, and Captain Usher of the Bittern, who are gone off for London. They sailed from Malta seven weeks since, and the Ambassadors are said to be in possession of Preliminaries from the Turkish Court, for Peace with this country. If so fortunately happened, as the Bittern came through the Bay of Biscay, that she fell in with the Hyperion, of 52 guns, on her outward voyage to Malta, on board of which was Mr. Adair and his suite, who is on an embassy to Turkey; and after the Ambassadors had explained to each other the nature of their mission, Mr. Adair considered it of importance to send back his Secretary by the Bittern, for further instructions from his Government, and he proceeded on his voyage to Malta: when the Ambassadors were landed, a salute of seventeen guns was fired from the Bittern. She sailed off Cadiz about three weeks since, and brings a confirmation of the French men of war in that harbour being in possession of the Spaniards; and it is said that the French Admiral was badly wounded before he struck his colours, and has since died of his wounds.

It is also reported, that the Russian fleet in the Tagus had given themselves up to the Portuguese.

It is reported that a Proclamation has been issued by the Junta of Seville, ordering the arrest of General Escheveria, as a Traitor. This is the Officer who commanded the Patriots in their first action with Dupont's army, in which they were worsted. He had, under the former Government, been guilty of some mal-practices, for which he was exiled to Ceuta. The above Proclamation is dated the 11th of June.

INTERESTING ADVICES FROM THE SPANISH PATRIOTS.

The Spanish Commissioners appointed by the Supreme Council of Seville, to conclude a Treaty of Peace and Alliance between Great Britain and Spain, are arrived. The Commissioners are Admiral Don Apodaca, and Major General Don Jacomie. They are accompanied by two other persons of distinction, in the capacity of Secretaries. They landed at Portsmouth on Thursday, amidst the acclamations of the populace and the ringing of bells. His Majesty's ship Revenge, which brought them from Cadiz, was decorated with the Spanish flag, and her commander, Sir John Gore, wore the cockade of the Patriots, with the inscription, "Long live Ferdinand the Seventh." He was frequently on shore at Cadiz, and, when he first landed, such was the enthusiasm of all ranks and descriptions, and their high esteem for the British character, that it was with great difficulty he could get excused from being carried by Ladies along the streets. The Commissioners reached town on Friday, and have already had an interview with Mr. Secretary Canning. The accounts they bring confirm all those we have from time to time published, relative to the enthusiastic determination of the brave Spaniards to extirpate their vile and perfidious oppressors.—Upon this interesting subject we have been favoured with the following important communication, which is, we believe, the very latest that has been received from that part of Spain:—

"Cadiz, June 18.—I returned last night from Seville, after having spent eight days in that city. The Supreme Junta is perfectly organized in all its various departments. They are night and day employed, and, go through an immensity of business. The army is on a highly respectable and formidable footing. The van-guard is at Carmona; it consists of about 5000 regulars, and as many volunteers. These, with what they have in other parts are constantly at work, learning the use of arms, and to march in order, and as soon as they acquire a tolerable knowledge of these arts, they are incorporated in the veteran corps, at a certain number per company. There will be a reinforcement of about 10,000 more. Regulars march daily to the army from this place and its environs, where they are no longer wanted, in consequence of the surrender of the French fleet at discretion.

"The repulse which the peasantry and about 2000 regulars experienced, from about 10,000 French coming into Cordova, alarmed the people here very much; but since the particulars have been well ascertained, every one appears in spirits. The army has been well organized. The French are completely cut off from Castille and La Mancha, and must surrender or be cut to pieces on the marching forward of the armies, which is to take place to-morrow, 10th inst.

"Castanos is at Carmona, he will take the command in chief; it is impossible to have a better General; he is well seconded by the celebrated Reding, brother to the distinguished Swiss Patriot, Aloys Reding. We are all in the best spirits, and are in no fear respecting the ultimate success of the just cause in which we have so heartily engaged."

When the Commissioners left Cadiz, the contributions in aid of the war, notwithstanding the actual distressed state of Spain, were productive beyond all expectation. In Cadiz alone, the merchants furnished the sum of 350,000 hard dollars. Eight thousand men were also raised in that city, completely armed, and on their march against the enemy. The regular force and militia in Seville and its vicinity, amounted to 40,000 men. There were besides 60,000 volunteers in arms. On the 15th of June, the inhabitants of Cadiz were in hourly expectation of official intelligence of the surrender of Dupont. The Governor of Malaga, at the head of 18,000 men, had marched to co-operate with the Patriots, by whom he was surrounded at Cordova and no doubt is entertained of the utter annihilation of the enemy's force in that quarter.—From Valentia, it is stated, that such was the inveteracy of the Spaniards towards the French, that upwards of 150 merchants resident in that province have fallen sacrifices to the indignation of the Spaniards at the atrocious perfidy of their Gallic oppressors.

A Copy of the Letter of the French Admiral Rosilly to the Governor of Cadiz, on his agreeing to surrender to the Spaniards the fleet under his command—it is as follows:

(TRANSLATION.)

"On Board the Hero, in the Bay of Cadiz, 14*th June,* 1808.

"CAPTAIN-GENERAL—I find myself compelled, in consequence of the means exercised against me, to give up the Fleet under my command, without further resistance; seeing that it is the interest of both nations not to destroy the ships.

"Although your Excellency has not announced to me, that the crews of the ships under my command, as well as their property, should be respected, I should reckon too much on Spanish honour, and the known generosity of your own character, to entertain any fears on those subjects.

"I request that your Excellency will only send a few troops at first, that the crews may evacuate, ship after ship, in order to avoid the confusion which has on such occasions taken place.

"According to the Laws of War, I request that you will permit, or procure permission for me to send an Officer to his Majesty the Emperor of the French, in order that I may be enabled to give him an account of the events which have taken place.

"I have the honour to be, with the highest consideration, your Excellency's most humble Servant.

(Signed) "ROSILLY."

Accounts from Majorca have been received at Gibraltar, which state that a vessel had arrived there from Barcelona, the Captain of which affirms, that there had been fighting between the French and Patriots in that City on the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th of last month, and that it continued when he left it on the 9th.

General Cuesta, one of the Patriot Generals, it is said, has sent word to Murat, at Madrid, that if he chose to evacuate Madrid and Spain, he should not be molested in his retreat; but that if he did not accept his offer, he must take the consequences, as he was advancing against him at the head of a strong army of the Patriots.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday, his Majesty held a private Levee at the Queen's Palace, when the following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:—

Lieutenant-General Calcraft, on his promotion; Colonel Hawker, on his being appointed Aide-du-Camp to his Majesty; Major-General Sir Samuel Achmuty, upon his being appointed to the command of the Ninth Garrison Battalion; the Rev. Dr. Mansel, upon his being elected to the Bishopric of Bristol; and Dr. Cornwall, the late Bishop of Hereford, on his translation to the Bishopric of Worcester.

His Majesty held a Privy Council for public business, and afterwards held another to receive the Recorder of London's report of the convicts under sentence of death in Newgate; when his Majesty was pleased to respite them during pleasure. His Majesty gave audiences to the Cabinet Ministers, Lord Heathfield, and Mr. Ryder, the Judge Advocate, who laid before his Majesty the proceedings of several Courts Martial.

CITY.

Tuesday a Court of Aldermen was summoned to meet at Guildhall, but a sufficient number of Aldermen not attending to constitute a Court, the Lord Mayor ordered the price of bread to be continued at 12½d. the quartern loaf of wheaten, and 10½d. household.

SPANISH PATRIOTS.

A Court of Common Council was held on Thursday at Guildhall, which was numerously attended.

Mr. Quin moved, that a dutiful and loyal Address be presented to his Majesty, expressive of the Thanks of the Court for the great, decisive, and magnanimous measures adopted by his Majesty towards assisting the glorious cause in which the Spanish nation is engaged, to defeat the perfidy and usurpation of the common enemy of Europe.

Mr. Alderman Birch seconded the motion.

Mr. Bell, in an animated speech, supported the motion. He did not agree with the sentiment maintained by some persons, that we ought to wait a little longer, till further information was received from Spain. The contest, said he, for freedom is commenced; the question betwixt the Spanish People and Bonaparte is at issue, and it is not fit that we should abide the event before we declare our opinion. If the Spanish Patriots succeed, let us share with them the glory of their victory. But if (which God forbid) they are reduced to slavery, let us not feel the remorse of reflecting that we have withheld our support to them on the day when they were fighting for freedom. He thought that more than an expression of our feelings might be given, and that money, the sinews of war, ought also to be voted, as the commencement of a general fund, that might be raised all over the country for this glorious purpose. He gave the highest approbation to his Majesty's Ministers for their prompt decision, and trusted that it would be followed with the happiest result.

After some discussion the motion was unanimously agreed to, and a Committee of all the Aldermen present, with a Commoner from each ward, was appointed to withdraw immediately and prepare an Address. The Committee having returned with a draft of an Address, the same was read, agreed to, and ordered to be signed by the Town Clerk and the Sheriffs, attended by the Remembrancer, be ordered to wait upon his Majesty, to know his Royal will and pleasure when the Court should attend him to present the same.

THE THEATRE.

MR. MAY AS ROVER IN WILD OATS.—LILLO'S TRAGEDY OF FATAL CURIOSITY.—MR. WINSTON'S ALTERATION OF MOLIERE'S FOURBERIES DE SCAPIN.

Mr. May, from the Belfast Theatre, on Tuesday night made his first appearance in London, as Rover, in Mr. O'Keefe's whimsical Comedy of Wild Oats. We are sorry to speak of any body with unqualified censure; and yet we have in vain considered how it would be possible, consistently with truth, to mix any kind of praise with our account of Mr. May's performance. It perhaps may be thought that it would be unfair to judge the powers of any actor by his performance of so extravagant a character as Rover; but we do not allow this plea: for it is to be presumed, (though it does not indeed invariably take place,) that an actor in choosing a part for his first appearance, chooses that kind of part which is most likely to shew his strength. A very good actor might fail in such a part as Rover, but he would fail in a manner totally opposite to the manner of Mr. May's failure. He would fail by under-acting so broad a part, while Mr. May fails by over-acting it. It is the character of a lively young Gentleman, who having arrived from India without money or connections, goes upon the stage for a subsistence: his conduct is a tissue of generosity and carelessness, courage and absurdity. He does a thousand things very little suited to the general course of society, and interlards his whole conversation with quotations from the Plays most generally acted. It is easy to see, that a character so eccentric must be in perpetual danger of becoming very coarse, unless the actor who performs it take especial care to avoid every kind of inelegance, and contrive to sustain the spirit of the humour, without dashing into vulgarity. In short, it is a sort of part, which, if it does strike, strikes with infinite force: but which, when displeases, must displease with an effect almost disgusting. An actor, accustomed to play in a more chaste kind of Comedy, (if indeed this, which is but a five-act Farce, may be called a Comedy at all,) would, perhaps, do but little with the part; would fail, but not displease. His habits and feelings would be perpetually shocked: he would find himself damped and flattened: and the damp and flatness would naturally spread itself to the audience. But the displeasure, which we felt at Mr. May's performance, arose from a totally different cause; it arose not through damps and flatness, but from that act of mixed tedium and indignation which is sure to fill the mind at the sight of heavy mirth and dashing impotence.

The Comic Muse has many suitors, for her gaiety and manners are generally enticing; but very few of her admirers are happy enough to obtain her favours. We do not speak of the bastard goddess of low Comedy; we mean the more dignified and elegant divinity. We hope that Mr. May will consider himself, from this moment, as a hopeless lover; and, like the wooers of Shakespeare's Portia, having failed in his chance, be content to court no more. His physical defects alone are sufficient to render success unattainable: his sharpness of visage, and his harshness of voice, must always make him unpleasing. But he has also a total want of dignity in his manner, of ease in his carriage, of whim in his drollery, and of impressiveness in his heroism. And if his external deficiencies are thus remarkable, his mental powers do not seem to compensate the evil. His conception is as bad as his execution. Our readers will, perhaps, be able to form some judgment of his intellectual incompetency, when we tell them, that, in repeating the line,

"A voice, potential double as the Duke's," that is, a voice twice as powerful as the Duke's; he gave the reading—

"A voice potential, double as the Duke's," as if he intended to say, a powerful voice, twice as loud as the Duke's.

Mr. May has a tolerably good figure, and, for ought we know, may be a gentlemanly man in private; but on the stage he is terribly inelegant, and seems too eager to make the most both of his person and his part. It may be right that every body should have a trial; but it is very bad upon us critics to be obliged to see such acters in such weather. The thermometer is too high, and our impatience grows hotter with our blood.

On Wednesday evening appeared, (for the first time) after a sleep of twenty years, Mr. George Lillo's tragedy of Fatal Curiosity. We see no reason for congratulating the public upon this revival.

Lillo is an author, not perhaps so highly estimated in this country as he ought to be; for though he has succeeded almost beyond any tragic poet, except only Shakspeare, in rousing the passions and touching the heart; he is scarcely ever mentioned when people are talking of Rowe, Otway, Fletcher, Dryden, and Massinger, and indeed appears to be a poet too little fashionable to be mixed with safety. The reason of this injustice it is not easy to determine; we are a little inclined to think that it arises from Lillo's practice of selecting domestic stories for his plays, and then not knowing how to suit his language to the genius of his fable. A domestic story, as we have known in the tragedy of the Gamester, may be made as perfectly pathetic, as the most exalted event of heroic history; but then it should be treated in a manner adapted to its own nature and capabilities. Now Lillo has in this very play selected a domestic story, and treated it in the language of princely tragedy. The incongruity shocks us, and we are tempted to smile at the language, when the situation ought to make us weep.—The characters at the Hay-Market are thus represented:—

Old Wilmot	Mr. Young.
Young Wilmot	Mr. Palmer, jun.
Eustace	Mr. Carles.
Randal	Mr. Thompson.
Agnes	Mrs. St. Leger.
Charlotte	Mrs. Bellamy.
Maria	Mrs. Mathews.

Old Wilmot and Agnes his wife, are reduced from a flourishing situation to gradual penury. This penury, and the supposed loss of their son, who has been many years absent from home without transmitting any accounts of himself, prey deeply on their spirits. They are relieved and consoled by Charlotte, who is tenderly attached to Young Wilmot, and whose distress at his unexplained absence, is no less heavy than theirs. During the depth of these sorrows, Young Wilmot suddenly arrives. He discovers himself to Charlotte, who at first fails to recognise him, in his disguise; and this inspires him with an idea of withholding the discovery from his parents, in order presently to increase their pleasure by a surprise. He therefore requests lodging at their house as a friend of Charlotte's. This favour they grant, and he entrusts his jewels to their care before he goes to rest. The temptation of so much wealth is beyond the faculties of resistance; Agnes proposes to her husband the murder of the Stranger; he agrees to the deed, and stabs Young Wilmot during sleep. As he comes out of the youth's apartment, Charlotte enters, with Eustace, the companion of her lover's voyage, and Randal, a servant of Old Wilmot. The murderer's bloody hands reveal the dreadful truth, and the wretched parents find themselves the destroyers of their own son. Old Wilmot stabs first his wife, and then himself.

Our readers will observe, that the sensation excited by this Play, is the sensation rather of horror than of sympathy. Plays shew the powers of an Author's genius, but do not please the spectators in general, who love to be interested rather than shocked. Here, till the third Act, we are detained by long dull declarations from all the characters: and in the third Act, which is the last, we are suddenly electrified by a piece of villainy, which, though it be not, we fear, totally improbable, is nevertheless of so atrocious a kind, under all the circumstances considering the characters of the parties, as to be productive more pain than pleasure to the audience. A murder, committed through avarice, that is, for the sake of getting wealth, is of all murders, that which people in general least willingly forgive. A murder committed through ambition, that is, for the sake of getting power, has something dazzling and splendid in its nature, and more easily obtains the allowance of the audience. Excepting this great difference in the motives, the great incident in the third Act of The Fatal Curiosity, almost resembles the murder of Duncan, by Macbeth and his wife, both in the conception of the plan, and in the language employed during the execution. The imitation seems too evident, to be denied. But this murder of Young Wilmot is not only shocking in itself, but has no attendant circumstances to make it more tolerable to the audience. If Young Wilmot had been made interesting, the sensation of horror at the murder would have been softened with a sensation of pity for the sufferer: but at present the mind dwells on the villany of the parents, and its horror is unmixed by the participation of any other feeling. The character of Maria is an incumbrance to the piece; she appears, only to sing a song, which would have been better left out.

Mr. Young did little for the part of Old Wilmot. His faults are not excusable, because the character affords considerable opportunities to a good actor for producing strong effects. Mr. Palmer had not indeed the same advantages in Young Wilmot, which is really a bad part: but he needed not have committed so gross an error as to appear before Charlotte and his father with an uncovered head. They must have recognised him in a state so completely undisguised. Mrs. Bellamy's Charlotte shewed more knowledge of melo-dramatic movement than of the human heart.

A Farce followed, called The Cheats of Scapin, altered by Mr. Winston (as we are told) from several Farces, but principally from Molière's Fourberies de Scapin. Mr. Winston does not seem to have done much for the Farce; which is a pity, for as he was so bad an actor, he ought to have been extremely careful to make amends to his brother-managers by exertions as an author. In fact, there is nothing in the piece worth noticing, except Mr. Mathews's cleverness in the assumption of several different tones and dialects.

LAW REPORT.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, WEDNESDAY, JU

SITTINGS BEFORE SIR JAMES MANSFIELD.

CRIM. CON.

FOWLER v. HODGSON.

The Plaintiff is an Attorney, and the Defendant was his articled clerk.

Mr. Serj. Onslow stated the case on the part of the P Mr. Fowler was an Attorney of that Court, of an unim character, and had been married for about twenty yea present wife, by whom he had four children, of wh one was living, a Lieutenant in the Marines. About fi years ago, the Plaintiff went out with the Volunteer C which he belonged, on a King's birth-day, which happen a very rainy day, and got so severe a rheumatism that he fined for twenty-two weeks, and had never yet comple covered from the effects of it. On account of his health, Mr. and Mrs. Fowler have had separate beds f ral years, and there had been a cessation of the accusto tercourse. She however continued to appear as affecti him as ever, until her criminal intercourse commenced Defendant. The Defendant was a young man, who articled to the Plaintiff as his Clerk, about the month o in the last year. From April till the month of Aug Defendant wrote in the office of the Plaintiff, but did no the house, nor take his meals there. In the month of however, when Mr. Fowler went down to Margate, had been ordered by his physicians, from the very da arture there appeared to be a considerable intimacy been the Defendant and the Plaintiff's wife, who always sent tea and luncheon; and introduced him into the house, to a ree of intimacy that she had never done before. It would ear in evidence, beyond all doubt, that there had been a minal intercourse between the Defendant and Mrs. Fowler ane Aubrey, a maid servant of Mr. Fowler's, proved, that mediately after her Master went to Margate last summer,

. Fowler staid very much in the back office with the Delant, and often had him in the drawing-room with her; that never she had seen them together in the drawing-room, the d near the fire was thrown down, and that she had fre-ntly brought tea to the Defendant by the order of her Miss, and that she also sometimes delivered letters to him. The ticular facts to which this witness deposed were, that on the of December last, on going into the back office, she saw . Fowler and the Defendant together, in a most indecent si-ion as to the clothes (the witness described this situation in a manner that the intercourse must be referred).

Mr. Serjeant Bell made an eloquent address to the Jury, in cation of damages, in case the Jury should believe the story by the Plaintiff's witnesses. He principally argued that it eared from the evidence, that if there had been any seduc-
, it was on the part of Mrs. Fowler, and that her husband ld not be said to have suffered any very heavy loss in losing society of a woman so indelicate and abandoned.

Sir James Mansfield thought that the proper measure and da-es in such cases was the value of actual loss of society and fort which the husband sustained. He knew that a new doc-e had been introduced lately, that in order to prevent the inse of adultery, Judges and Juries should be disposed to very large damages as punishment for the moral offence. He not think the law meant to give that power to Judges and ies of this species of action; but that was merely an action a civil injury, and that the damages should be proportioned hat civil injury. He then shortly recapitulated the evidence, observed that the seduction appeared to come altogether a Mrs. Fowler, and to have began from the moment she had her husband on board of the Margate boy.

The Jury retired for a short time, and brought in a verdict the Plaintiff—Damages 150*l*.

OLD BAILEY.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 13.

The Court was occupied the greater part of the day by the of Hanc Dewberry, on a capital indictment, for a rape mitted by himself and two other persons, named Raymond Courtney, the 12th of April last, on the body of Margaret st, spinster, aged eighteen years, in Duke-street, Lincoln's-fields. The circumstances of this have already been pretty y detailed to the public. Raymond and Courtney have fled, have since eluded all pursuit for their apprehension; there-Dewberry was the only prisoner brought to trial.

The prosecutrix underwent a long cross-examination; in the rse of which, she acknowledged that she had been sometimes he habit of drinking spirits; that she had sometimes drank glasses of a day, particularly on the very night after her ster; but she swore positively that she was quite sober at moment she spoke to Raymond, and perfectly chaste to that
; that her dress and address at the time were not immodest; every improper freedom used towards her was against her and resistance; that she was positive at the time that the oner was one of those who had maltreated her, though the t had of them; but that she never did say she would for ey decline the prosecution.

Mrs. Mills, and her two servants, deposed to the cries heard the prosecutrix.

For the prisoner, a number of witnesses were brought ford to prove, that the prosecutrix was much addicted to drink-

And one woman, in particular, swore hard, that she had her daily at all hours, from seven in the morning till nine ight, for nearly two years and a half, and never saw her e sober. One witness swore, that the prosecutrix then said the prisoner had done her no harm, but that those who away were the worst. There were several witnesses who e the prisoner a good character. Sir Allan Chambre remulated the evidence for the Jury, who, after retiring half our, brought in their verdict—Not Guilty.

FRIDAY, JULY 15.

Yesterday Reuben Main the elder, and Sarah Smith, tried under a committal by the warrant of J. W.
n, Esq. one of the Coroners of the County of Middlesex, ging him with the wilful murder of Reuben Main the younger, a boy about ten years old, son of the male prisoner, in a sand-house belonging to Mr. Rhodes, at Kingsland, in the parish of St. John, Hackney, on the 2d of June last. He was in another count charged with wilfully and maliciously setting fire to the said house, whereby the said boy lost his life.

The only shadow of criminality consisted in two circumstances —the one, that a female brickmaker swore she heard the male prisoner declare with an oath in a public house, that he would burn down the sand house; and the other, that he got a match from the publican at a late hour on that night. Neither of the circumstances were proved. The humanity and affectionate conduct of the father towards his son, were circumstances not a little in his favor:—the man was much affected during the trial:—
there was not a tittle of evidence against the woman. The trial concluded with a humane charge to the Jury, from Justice Le Blanc, and which was immediately followed by the Jury pronouncing the prisoners Not Guilty.

INTENSE HEAT OF THE WEATHER.

The thermometer, under the northern entrance of the Royal Exchange, was Thursday at noon at 87. The thermometer in the shade at a window in the open air, opposite St. James's Park (without any reflection of heat) was on Tuesday last, at three o'clock, P. M. at 88½, and on Wednesday at 94. In a transparent glass thermometer at a window in the Strand on Wednesday afternoon, it was 101.

Thursday morning, about half past six o'clock, a tornado passed along the northern suburbs of the metropolis, in an eastern direction. It was ushered in, as in the tropical climate, by a profound calm, and then by a small, but gradually enlarging black cloud, the progress of which was accompanied by a thick column of dust. At the different places where this phenomenon was noticed, its effects were felt for above five minutes.

A similar phenomenon passed over the metropolis about three o'clock, in the direction of the river. Two trees in St.
James's Park, nearly opposite the Palace, were completely stripped of their branches, and left like flag-staffs. It was singular, that at the same moment there was hardly a breath of air felt out of its range.

The heat of the weather has been found so oppressive for the last five days, that not less than fifty mail-coach and post-horses have been killed by it in their work upon the great North Road.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

PLYMOUTH, JULY 8.—Thursday presented a most interesting spectacle to a number of spectators assembled on the occasion, near Mill Bay. An order was issued by Admiral YONGE to Captain COTGRAVE, Superintendant of Prisoners of War at this port, to embark all the Spanish prisoners 2000 in number, on board seven transports lying between the island and main.
It was a lively animating scene.—While the boats were rowing into the beach, some parties were dancing their favourite fan-dango to the sound of the guitar; other parties were seated on the beach singing national airs, and making up segars for a sea store; a still greater number were slowly moving, with the gravity of Spaniards, as if meditating on the great events now taking place in Spain.

COVE OF CORK, JULY 9.—Sir A. WELLESLEY is here; he is now (three o'clock) visiting the different troop ships.
No orders have as yet been given out, but little doubt is entertained as to our sailing. The regiments embarked are, the 5th, 9th, 36th, 38th, 40th, 45th, 60th, 71st, and 91st, besides four companies of the 95th, two troops of Commissariate Drivers, part of the 20th Light Dragoons, and the four veteran battalions for Gibraltar. The number of transports exceeds 80.
Several came in this morning; more, I believe, than there are troops under orders to fill. The Masters of the transports have received open instructions, and in case of parting with the convoy, Tangier Bay is pointed out as the place of rendezvous, and their orders are on no account to attempt to pass the Gut of Gibraltar without protection.

DIED.

On Friday morning, at four o'clock, after a few hours illness, at his house at Camberwell, the Lady of Thomas Plummer, Esq.

A melancholy instance of the uncertainty of human life has occurred in the family of Sir Frederick Eden, Bart. His son came home last week from boarding-school, ill with the scarlet fever, and through the maternal affection and anxiety of Lady Eden, who had only lain-in a week, she, sad to relate, caught the infection, and to the inexpressible grief of all her acquaintance, died on Thursday.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER THIRTY.

PEACE WITH RUSSIA AND DENMARK—RESTITUTION OF THE DANISH FLEET.

A great General, when he has obtained a considerable advantage over the enemy, unremittingly pursues it. Not a moment's repose is granted; but the pursuit continued from one strong position to another, till the enemy is totally annihilated, or obliged to surrender at discretion. A great Statesman should act on the same principles. The glorious change which has taken place in Spain and Portugal, is unquestionably the only decided advantage which has been obtained over Bonaparte since the commencement of his nefarious career. The more unexpected this disaster, the greater must be his astonishment and consternation. Men who have been invariably fortunate in their pursuits, are more confounded at a sudden reverse of fortune, than others who are more inured to disappointment. An individual, who had run so madly in the career of fortune, who had so frequently vaunted her propitious influence, is suddenly opposed by almost insurmountable difficulties, at the very end of his course, where he least expected them, and where he was least prepared to meet them.

But this extraordinary man has so often baffled calculations, so frequently turned to his advantage the difficulties which seemed most to menace him, that beholding a brave people defying his immense resources, whilst we admire their courage and virtue, and take the liveliest interest in their success, we feel an involuntary apprehension that they may be unsuccessful. Not that we doubt of their final success, but their interests are so interwoven with our own, their liberty so inseparably connected with that of Europe, that we behold this contest with the animated sympathy of strongly interested spectators. We see our friends, our relatives, (related to us by the strongest ties of interest, love of independence, and horror of oppression) contending with a bold, unprincipled ruffian, and his ferocious soldiery. We know the remorseless heart of that sanguinary monster; and our imagination, aided by past experience, draws a horrid picture of desolated fields, burned habitations, and plundered cities. We know the man, we know the insult he has received, and we know that his vengeance, if it be in his power, will be equal to the mortification he suffers.

The people of this country, who are as celebrated for their humanity as for their love of freedom, agitated by these reflections, shrink with horror at the idea of the atrocities which may be exercised on Spain. In their ardent interest for their Spanish brethren, they overlook possibilities, and reproachfully ask our Ministers, why have not our several Expeditions already sailed? Convinced of the bravery of our troops, they anticipate their success. National feelings are here absorbed by more comprehensive sentiments; they are totally insensible to the dangers our soldiers are going to encounter. They impatiently wait for the first news of their arrival on Spanish ground, of their junction with the patriots, of their marching at their sides to engage the perfidious enemy, and of their victories. With the same anxiety they enquire if Austria intends to make no diversion; and if our Government has done nothing to conciliate Russia and Denmark? Now they say is the moment when petty considerations and unmeaning disputes must yield to the great interests of humanity. We have defied the united efforts of Europe. We have convinced the Powers of the North and of the South of their inability to scare us into a renunciation of our maritime rights. It is time to awaken them from their fatal delusion, in order to turn all their energy against their common tyrant.

These are the reflections which appear to occupy the attention of the public in this moment; and these are the motives which induce us to resume a subject, which has been so frequently and ably canvassed. However, as it is of the highest expediency to conciliate the States of the Continent in this important juncture: And as the seizure of the Danish Fleet was the principal, and in fact, the only specious pretext for their unnatural confederacy against us, it is a consideration of the first magnitude, that we re-examine a subject which appeared to have had such decided influence on the resolutions of the Russian Court. It gave the French faction in St. Petersburgh such an opportunity for charges and invective against our Government, that no consideration, no sacrifice is too weighty, when put in competition with the advantages we gain, were Russia brought over to the common cause. The part she takes will have a decided influence on the other States of the Continent; and were the Restitution of the Danish Fleet, now that we have nothing to apprehend from it, capable of effecting a salutary change in the Councils of that Court, the most enlightened policy would suggest the imperious necessity of making that Restitution immediately, and even unconditionally.

The unprincipled ambition of Bonaparte, his inveterate hatred to this country, and the weakness of the Danish Government, together with the animosity which the Danes felt against us since the memorable 2d of April, now convince us that the present Ministry were not only justifiable in seizing it, but deserved the gratitude of their Country, for having prevented its falling into the possession of the enemy. Had they, three months ago, overruled by the indecent invectives, and affected love of justice of some members among their opponents, given back to the Danes their fleet, instead of conciliating Denmark, Russia, or any other State on the Continent, their concession would have been attributed to pusillanimity and to the desperate opinion we entertained of our situation. This ill-timed moderation would shew, by the extravagance of their pretensions, their contempt of our courage; and whilst these States would dastardly crouch to the French Usurper, they would endeavour to efface the shame of their cringing servility to him, by an insolent resistance to our rights. The whole conduct of our Ministers, in that delicate affair, was that of consummate Statesmen. Their firmness in resisting the clamours of faction, and the hypocritical humanity of disappointed ambition, was more deserving of our praise, than the vigour by which they counteracted the possible treachery of Denmark. Most men are capable of an energetic measure; but to adhere to it and its consequences, in spite of obloquy, is an undeniable proof of genius.

But now the situation of Europe is completely reversed. The energy and firmness we displayed in the most awful crisis in which a nation had been ever placed, would, in the present happy change, be justly condemned as tyranny and impolicy. Our action was solely justifiable, as it was dictated by the most imperious necessity. This necessity now no longer exists, and we can fulfil the duties of honour and integrity, without running any risk, that our concession will be attributed to weakness or fear. As nothing shews a Government in a more contemptible light, than want of firmness in a dangerous and doubtful crisis, so no one circumstance raises the esteem and admiration of mankind more, than when it displays moderation and magnanimity in the midst of triumph. The Romans afford us here, as on almost every other occasion, a great lesson. It was a general maxim of the policy of that magnanimous community, to consider the slightest concession as tantamount to ruin, whenever a public calamity, or danger, gave their enemies an opportunity of dictating conditions. This proud, unyielding policy, was observed by them in the lowest ebb of their fortunes. After the total destruction of several armies, after having been abandoned by all their Allies, after Hannibal had deprived them, in the course of three or four campaigns, of all the glorious fruits of 500 years of the most unexampled prowess and public virtue. After they had nothing left but their city, they rejected every overture of Hannibal, as scornfully as if they had been masters of Italy, Sicily, and Spain. This same policy they observed in their war against Perseus. The Macedonian Monarch, after having defeated a Roman army, thought the opportunity favourable for negociating with the Republic. The conditions were so advantageous to the Romans, that they would not have dictated any others themselves, had they been in possession of that Monarch's capital. But the Senate was too enlightened, as not to see through the motives of Perseus. Their concession would have impressed on the several States of Greece and Asia, the superiority of the Macedonian Phalanx over their Legions. They therefore haughtily refused to listen to any other condition, but an unconditional surrender of Perseus to their discretion. Hence their famous maxim: Parcere Subjectis, debellare Superbos.

Though we make no pretensions, as they did, to found our greatness on the subjection of mankind, let us, however, adopt their enlightened policy; for it is still more conducive to the security of a state, than it is to its aggrandisement. As ministers have adopted the same haughty, unyielding firmness after the peace of Tilsit; and as the present fortunate Revolution in the affairs of Europe stamps on their conduct the highest political sagacity; they will adopt the second maxim of Roman policy, and magnanimously say to the Danes, "We have "taken your fleet, because you were not able to secure it "from the grasp of our enemy. When our safety, "your own, and that of Europe, rendered it a measure "of imperious necessity, you obstinately refused to listen "to any compromise. As our conduct on that oc- "casion was dictated by motives very different from "ambition or rapacity, we easily overlooked the ex- "travagance of your enmity: and whilst we commis- "erated your fatal delusion, we made a just allowance "for the resentment you felt. You become the instrument "of an ambitious tyrant, from whom you had more to "apprehend than we had. You have now acquired some "experience of what you have to expect from this mon- "strous alliance; and we suppose your resentments will "not render you indifferent to the fate of the Spanish "family, and of the Sovereign Pontiff, who had more "claims to the friendship of your new Ally, than you "possibly pretend to. We will not insult your un- "standing, by arguments to convince you of your "interests, nor lessen the merit of voluntary acquiesc- "by going through the forms of negociation. We "nothing at present to fear from your weakness, "though we esteemed your courage, we never ap- "hended your enmity. We therefore give back "fleet, because the atrocities committed in Spain a "Rome must now convince you of the perfidious "racter of Bonaparte. You may join Europe again "common tyrant, or resume your ancient lucrative "trality; for we do not arrogate, as a detestable c "would insinuate to controul the conduct of other "vernments; and we will not allow them the slighte "terference in our Maritime rights."

Let us conceive the admiration which this magnan would produce on the Continent. What change eve months are capable of effecting in public affairs. A occurrence enables us now to follow the natural di of our national character, and to adopt a magnan which some time ago it would have been both villai folly in the extreme to propose. It proves, at the time, that the situation of a people is never desp till they, or their Government have the baseness to it so.

Our Ministers, in the unprecedented difficulties they been placed in, by only acting up to this maxim o man policy, That the slightest concession, in a dang crisis, is tantamount to ruin, saved the country fro most imminent peril, and according to human calcula Europe from the bondage of the most loathsom detestable ruffian that ever disgraced the annals of hi A happier prospect is now before us; and if our Mi display as much moderation in prosperity, as the firmness and dignity in an unpropitious moment, the justly deserve the glorious title of being the savio Europe. It has been very justly said, that prosperit surer test of judgment than adversity. As they however, under the most trying difficulties, deserv confidence and gratitude of the country, we may e from their future exertions as fortunate a result. It the character of this Paper to attain popularity by criminate abuse, or undistinguished commendatio it seizes with pleasure this opportunity of doing just an Administration, which in the most awful conjunctu displayed, in the management of our foreign affa rare union of firmness and moderation. We are not of being grateful, where gratitude is due, and as k they continue to have the same distinguished claims to lic confidence, we will continue to be the organs honest and enlightened among our fellow-citizens, a stow on them the commendation they merit.

If Denmark has conducted herself with an ex gant display of rancour, and with ridiculous anim the very idea of her present inability to render u direct or indirect injury, immediately disarms our geance. We can have no dispute with that State in consequence of an impertinent interference i Maritime Rights. But the tremendous example we given, how dreadful we are as enemies, and how we have been as friends, will teach her more prudenc the future. She will not be so eager to enter into a Northern Confederacy, or armed Neutrality. Her fortunes, in curing her of her rashness and presum will teach her to appreciate her relative strength that if a war with us be the greatest calamity tha befal her, our friendship is the securest prop of her pendence and prosperity.

Though the present King of Denmark possesses a deal of exaltation and eccentricity, he is far from b weak, and by no means a dishonest, man; we believe on the contrary, to possess a great fund of probit nour. And this very circumstance will account for the travagant resentment he displayed at the supposed in-tice of our attack. The only means of working on a n of that description is by an appeal to his feelings and uerosity. And why should he not be treated, as every od man would conduct himself towards an eccentric aracter in private life, he flatters his reigning foible in der to render him an useful member to himself and so-ty. We have nothing, at present, to apprehend from mistaken notions of the King of Denmark; but we y render his exaltation and eccentricity extremely use-to the common cause of Europe. As he has a strong cture of the romantic in his composition, to which his nestic misfortunes might have contributed, in restoring generously and unconditionally his Fleet and Colo-s, we will gain more on his affections than if we were to r him a convenient Swedish Province, or an additional nd, but clogged with clauses and conditions. He has n a good son, and is a most excellent husband, and a y indulgent father. He is loved and esteemed by his jects on account of his moderation, accessibility, and ct attention to his duties. Therefore the more gene-s and unconditional the restitution is, the more useful render him in the present crisis. And should he even a traitor to himself, to his country and to Europe, t have we to apprehend from his miserable ships? ere is the French army they might now transport to coasts? And after the example the Spaniards have en us, and the accession of their Fleet to our own, shall hesitate to do a magnanimous and, at the same time, a dent action, from the very improbable apprehension of r abusing our generosity? Such examples of treachery very rare. But supposing the Danish Government uld act in that monstrous manner, and that instead of teen ships we restored them a hundred, after the ex-ple given us in the South of Europe, we appeal to the ve courage of our countrymen, if we should be afraid resent of a visit on our shores from a Danish Fleet and rench Army? We know our countrymen better; and re they have to decide between a great decisive mea-, by which the liberty of Europe is secured, and an in-on from eighteen Danish ships, they will not long ate.

nother consideration, though certainly not the least im-ant, is the certainty we have of gaining Russia likewise his measure. The Russian Government in all its public arations, and in its private communications to our Mi-r, affected to consider the seizure of the Danish Fleet e cause of her rupture. The majority of the people at country are interested in our favour; and as soon re have given them an opportunity of raising their es against the pernicious influence of a corrupt cabal, will soon efface from the mind of Alexander the un-nate bias he has received. However, in case of a wal of our former friendly intercouse with that coun-no adulation should be employed, as if we gave back Fleet in compliment to her Monarch. This is always nded with future inconveniences; and the more simply o to work, the more judiciously we act: we give back Fleet, because we have no more to apprehend from Danes nor their Fleet; and because we are convinced every Government, in possession of its senses, is now naded how dangerous and atrocious a ruffian Bona-e is. We have no doubt of the intentions of Austria sist Bonaparte; and this act of justice on our part facilitate the renewal of her ancient friendship with this single act (the restitution of eighteen Danish) we may probably form a coalition of Europe against ce, but better concerted than any preceding one—At the experiment is well worth trying. The disadvan-s that may result from it are trifling in comparison he advantages we may expect. We therefore wish this measure may be speedily carried into effect.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH, DUTCH, AND SWEDISH PAPERS.

SWEDEN.

STOCKHOLM, JULY 4.—His Royal Swedish Majesty has been pleased to appoint a Board of Regency during his voyage to the coast of Finland and Poland, composed of Count Axel Trolli Wachmeister, Lieutenant-General Count Fersen, General Baron Stedingk, Count Samuel Ugglas, Lieutenant-General Baron Cederstrom, and Baron Ehrenheim.

His Royal Majesty has received the following report from Field Marshal Count Klingspor, dated Head-quarters, Old Carleby and Jurobotad, the 18th and 26th of June.

"My last report was of the 14th inst. which I dispatched from Hemmango, having since made several movements to turn the enemy's strong position in Old Carleby, and thereby to compel him to abandon the same, when I received the unexpected intelligence that the enemy, 5000 strong, had evacuated Old Carleby. Having occupied that position, I thought it necessary to reinforce the corps under the orders of Col. Sandell, since I had received a report of his having been two days engaged with the enemy, the particulars of which action I am, however, not yet acquainted with. The Russians have, however, fallen back further to New Carleby, and their advanced posts are near Sandby, a quarter of a mile from Jacobstad.

"In consequence of your Royal Majesty having ordered another expedition to proceed from Sweden to Wasa, in order to make a diversion in favour of the Finnish army, I thought it right to pursue the enemy after the evacuation of Old Carleby, with the utmost vigour, I made accordingly the necessary dispositions to attack New Carleby, which was occupied by the enemy, and by carrying the position, to become masters of the road of Lappo and Wasa, which separate in opposite directions on the other side of New Carleby, the former in order to keep up the communication with Sawolax, and the latter with regard to the division on the side of Wasa.

"The attack was made on the 23d with so much gallantry and success, that the Russians were driven from New Carleby, with the loss of 70 men taken prisoners, and a much greater number killed and wounded.

MAURICE KLINGSPOR, Field-Marshall and General in Chief of the Finnish Army.

GOTTENBURGH, JULY 8.—According to private letters from Stockholm, received by the post of to-day, the King is gone to Finland for the purpose of having a meeting with the Emperor Alexander. It is stated in these letters, that the reason of the successes of the Swedes against the Russians in Finland has been, that considerable numbers of the latter have been ordered to march into Russian Poland, which country, it is rumoured, Bonaparte demanded; and those letters go so far as to say, that the meeting of Alexander and Gustavus has for its object the forming a new Coalition against France, to which Austria will join all her force. These reports, we fear, are at least premature, if not entirely unfounded.

JULY 11.—The reports of Austria preparing war, and of the meeting between the King of Sweden and the Emperor of Alexander, continue to prevail. Two English and two Swedish Messengers go by this packet.

DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN, JUNE 26.—It is asserted that the reason of the misunderstanding which prevails between the English and the Swedes, and which has hitherto prevented the landing of the troops arrived at Gottenburgh, is, that a demand was made on the part of England to occupy alone two strong places, namely, Gottenburgh and Marstrand, which Sweden has hitherto not conceded.

Six of our gun-boats, which sailed from Kioge Bay on the morning of the 26th, were attacked by an English ship of war. After a pretty long cannonade the ship of the line sheered off, and our boats proceeded on their voyage.

BONAPARTE'S CONSTITUTION FOR SPAIN.

PROCLAMATION.

BADAJOS, JUNE 27.—The following Notice was received at ne o'clock at night from his Excellency the General of the rovince:—

" SORIA, JUNE 18.—It appears that the Divine Blessing ain attends us and the Generalissimo. Our Lady of Pilar has ven us a new proof of her favour and protection. After the nch had fallen in the battles of Tudela, Mallen, Gaul, and rragon, in which places they appeared to the number of 5 or 00, an army of 12,000 French had orders to enter Saragossa the day of Corpus Christi, and the command was, that the wn should be penetrated, although only one soldier remained descend from the ramparts. By the miraculous interference the Holy Virgin, a battle was fought by the Patriots against ese troops, at the distance of only a gun-shot from Saragossa. ll the French were put to the sword, not a single man remained tell the dismal narrative to his countrymen. The Aragonese ught like furies, and as they approached the enemy, they rew away their muskets and rushed upon the plain regardless life. Four hundred horses which remained, and 27 baggage aggons were taken after this victory. Our loss, it is supposed, s been great, but without considerable sacrifices no such iumphs can be acquired; conquest, however, will amply repay the losses we sustain.

This is communicated to the Public, for its satisfaction, by der of the Junta. ANTONIO BERGER, Sec.

By order of the Supreme Junta of Government, this informa-on is published.

Seville, June 29, 1808. JUAN BAUTISTA PARDO, Sec.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM GIBRALTAR, JUNE 26.

" The Spanish arms go on most prosperously in this and the djoining provinces. Dupont's army of 15,000 men, which had ended to proceed to Seville, has begun its retreat from Cor-ova, to join Murat at Madrid; after losing nearly a third of s number, by desertion, sickness, or being cut off by the na-ives, who are universally armed, and who destroy every party hat ventures from the main body of the French army. General astanos, who commands the Spanish army, is in pursuit of Du-ont's division, with nearly 20,000 men. All the passes in the ountains through which Dupont's army must retreat, are occu-ied by the Spanish troops and peasantry, and his destruction is onsidered as inevitable. The total of the French force in Spain oes not now amount to more than 40,000 men—it never exceeded 0,000; and was always greatly exaggerated, to awe the na-ives, and we have certain accounts of more than 18,000 having een cut off, or taken prisoners, since the commencement of hos-ilities against them by the Spaniards.

" The French have been guilty of the most inhuman cruelties nd excesses in Spain, particularly at Cordova, where every ouse was ransacked for three days. Even the churches were lundered, and converted into stables. Many of the inhabitants were murdered at Cordova, in attempting to protect their wives nd daughters against the brutal violence of the soldiery. The ancet of the Spaniards in return amounts to almost a frenzy; hell officers can seldom save a single French prisoner alive. All the plunder collected by Murat in Madrid, and by Junot in Portugal, has been intercepted by the Spaniards at Navarre, and the French cut to pieces who escorted it."

FROM THE SEVILLE GAZETTE.

ORDER OF THE DAY, JUNE 22.

SOLDIERS! The light troops of our van have given a proof of their intrepid patriotism. They reached Cordova by forced marches, and, at that very moment, it became necessary to dislodge the enemy from several points. The Commandant of the van, considering that the troops must be tired after such exertions in this hot weather, desired 50 men per battalion from among those who should find themselves less exhausted, and better able to endure fatigue, to come out of the ranks, of their own accord; when they all, without exception, contended which should go first; and the Superior Officers were under the necessity of appointing those who were to form the detachment!

Soldiers! This gallant conduct ought to excite your emulation; and I, who see the martial spirit with which you long to come within sight of the enemy, flatter myself that you will vie with your worthy companions in this patriotic heroism. You shall soon see, and conquer the enemy.

(Signed) CASTANOS.

The French garrison in Madrid does not amount to 8000 men. The Duke of Berg continued in the Monclova, whence he intended to remove to the Retiro, as soon as it should be fortified. Moncey's division, consisting of 4 or 5000 men, had marched out of Madrid, making inquiries respecting the roads which lead to several provinces, so that its destination is not known. The division, formerly quartered in the Escurial, which had proceeded against Segovia, and was 6000 strong, was beaten by the Segovians on the 8th, with the loss of 2000 men. One morning, a party of Volunteers of Spain, who were in Madrid, having given their bait of corn to their horses, the Sergeant ordered the saddle and saddle-bags to be put on, and the party to form on the Barley-square. He next mustered them, and ordered them to mount, draw their swords, and sound a march through Toledo-Port-Street. The French Guard at the Gate immediately fell in, and paid them the military honours. The Sergeant returned the usual salute, and the party deserted, nor have they been heard of since.

FROM THE GIBRALTAR CHRONICLE, JULY 2.

EDICT PUBLISHED IN THE ISLAND OF MAJORCA.

Ferdinand VII. King of Spain and adjacent Islands, &c. and in his Royal Name, his Excellency the Captain-General of his Army and Kingdom.

I make it known to the faithful inhabitants of this island, that last night I convened in my palace a meeting, composed of all the Constituted Authorities, to lay before them the course which ought to be pursued under the existing circumstances, in which both my loyalty and the unanimous wish of the people was, that we should continue to acknowledge Ferdinand VII. our lawful Sovereign, in consequence whereof, it was agreed upon, that these Islands shall continue faithful to his Majesty Ferdinand VII. to which end, and that we may have the benefit of the full exercise of the rights of Sovereignty, in his name, as far as is requisite, a Board was appointed, which will begin this very evening to exercise their authority, and publish what may be deemed conducive to the prosperity of the Island.—A Te Deum shall be sung, and then shall be a levee, royal salute, and illumination.

(Signed) D. JUAN MIGUEL DE VIVES.

By command of his Excellency, and, as Secretary, authorised by the Board.

(Signed) BARTHOLOME JONAS.

Royal Palace of Palma, May 20, 1808.

The Supreme Board has sent the following Letter:—

" MOST SERENE SIR,

" D. Dionisis Capez, Member of this Board, and an ensign in the navy, accompanied by the Portuguese Captain D. Sebastian Martinez, is going, in the name of this Board, to inform Y. M. S. H. of the occurrences which have lately taken place and, as they are thought most important, it has been deemed requisite that he should give you a verbal account of the same, that you may take the resolutions and send us the assistance which we stand in need of. May God, &c.

(Signed) " The Marquis DE CARRION."

" Ayamonte, June 20, 1808."

The purport of this verbal information is, that the French have been driven from the forts on the right bank of the Guadiana, opposite to Ayamonte; the inhabitants of that [illegible] by the few regulars who were there, and a handful of armed Portuguese, have beaten the French by which they were garrisoned, and hoisted the Spanish flag in every one of them. The loss of the enemy amounts to 91 prisoners, and a number killed.

The whole of the Kingdom of Algarve is in a state of insurrection. Villa Real and Castromarin, as well as the Batteries of the Casmasquera and St. Antes, have been taken possession of. The Rebel, Mallit, has been handcuffed, and let down into a dry well, with 26 other individuals. The remainder of the French troops have fled to the mountains. Tarino, Taro, and Oullo, are up in arms, and the military chests of the French have been seized. The few Spanish troops above-mentioned consisted of Catalonians, Provincials, and a small number of Murcians. A Portuguese Captain is come to inform the Board, that Algarve and the whole kingdom wish to be under its protection, in the name of Ferdinand VII.

ORDERS OF THE SUPREME JUNTA AT BADAJOS.

CORUNNA, JULY 9.—A respectable person of this city received a letter yesterday by the posts, written by a Priest to his brother, to the following effect:—

"It is notorious that Murat, apprised that in various places they opened the mails, and killed those persons who favour the French interest, has adopted the infamous plan of writing to the Magistrates elected by the people, a letter to the following purport:—

"Sir, I observe what you write me, and on such a day will arrive in your neighbourhood, with the number of French troops you desire, in order to restrain the Revolutionists."

"Such are the contents; and the object is, manifestly, that when the letters are opened, treason may be attributed to the new commanders, and their death may be occasioned, and the army of the Patriots be left without leaders.

"This expedient, which has been detected, gives some idea of the precaution necessary to avoid the consequence of the perfidy of Murat and his agents, who are endeavouring to spread discord and confusion among the people in every possible direction. If union and good order be not preserved, we shall never accomplish the purpose we have in view, which is to defend our religion, our country, and our beloved Sovereign, Ferdinand VII. Be valiant and loyal; respect the Magistrates and Constituted Authorities, forget private resentments, and all will be attained."

"Badajoz, 21st June, 1808."

ALICANT, JUNE 16.—The insurrection in Spain has been en masse in every corner. The only places now in the possession of the French are, Madrid and Barcelona; but the communication between those cities and France has been cut off; and a division, consisting of 15,000 men, sent from Madrid to Seville, has been destroyed during its march, which has had a surprising effect on the public mind.—Each province raises its own army, and appoints its own rendezvous. In Almanza no fewer than 160,000 men are, to a considerable degree, organized, and a large portion of them is sent into Catalonia.—The regular Spanish army, to a man, is decidedly against the French cause, and is uniformly employed in heading, incorporating, and disciplining their countrymen.—In the city of Valencia, the populace have massacred all the French prisoners, to the number of 300, and, it is feared, that 100 in jail here, will share the same fate.—Our French Consul is in the common jail, having no means of communication with his countrymen.

PORTUGAL.

Manuel J. G. Sepulveda, Commander of the Order of Christ, &c. &c. Governor of the Province of Trastos Montes;

Feeling it to be my duty under the present circumstances, to take all necessary care for the safety of this province, more particularly as it contains no troops of the line, I make known to all deserters, that, in the name of the Prince Regent of Portugal, our Sovereign, I pardon all such, if, within fifteen days, they repair to this town, and enrol themselves in my presence in the troops which I am about to form, under the Officers who gave proofs of their loyalty in the late reduction of the enemy. I invite, likewise, those who aided in that affair to enlist, and promise them rations and other provisions. In the present posture of affairs, no more words are necessary to excite the true Portuguese, co[illegible] ample of their neighbours, the Spaniards. G[illegible] at Braganza.

June 11, 1[illegible] SEPULVEDA.

The Provi[illegible] of Government of Oporto, calls upon all [illegible] Regiment of the Line, who are not actually employed in the service of this province, to join the two regiments which are to be organized in this city. Every soldier who joins the said regiments, is to have a bounty of one month's pay, and receive every day four vintins, besides regimentals, accoutrements, and the usual military allowance. Every soldier who serves already in the said regiments, or shall serve in them in future, shall enjoy the same pay; the present circumstances do not permit to allow more. The Militia, when on actual duty, shall enjoy the same.

The Bishop, President and Governor.

Oporto, the 20th June, 1808.

PROCLAMATION.

In the name of the Prince Regent of Portugal, the Supreme Council of Government of the City of Oporto makes known to all the subjects of the said Prince, our Lord, that the French Government is entirely abolished and exterminated in this country, and the royal authority of our lawful Sovereign restored, which authority shall be fully and independently exercised by the said Supreme Council, until the Government appointed in this kingdom by his Royal Highness shall have resumed their functions. In pursuance thereof, the said Council orders and directs, that our said Royal Master shall be proclaimed, and his royal arms put up and respected, as they always were, and always ought to be; and that all the Constituted Authorities shall act in conformity herewith, and all orders shall be expedited in the royal name of our said Lord.

The Bishop, President and Governor.

Oporto, 19th June, 1808.

EDICT,

IN THE NAME OF THE PRINCE REGENT OUR LORD.

The Supreme Council of Government, appointed in this city, ordains and directs, that Jesé Monteiro Guedes de Vasconcellos Mourao, Captain of Cavalry, shall take charge of the Military Government of the whole district of Penafiel, Tamega, and Amarante, and issue all orders necessary for the Royal Service in the name of his Royal Highness; all persons being bound to obey him and lend him all necessary assistance, on pain of being dealt with as rebels and traitors to the State. He is to transmit the necessary advice to all the officers and soldiers who served in the Portugueze army, directing them to join the said army without the least loss of time. He is also to require the Public Boards in the neighbouring Districts, in proof of their loyalty and religion, to procure, with all possible display, the necessary supplies of men, money, accoutrements, and horses, and whatever else may be required for the defence of our religion, of the state, and of their own honour, and lives; and of those of their children, which are all assailed by Napoleon, Emperor of the French, who shall be repulsed with all the spirit and energy which belong to the religion, the happiness, the honour, and the valour of the Portuguese. And in order that this may be universally known, the Supreme Council of Government orders the present Edict to be immediately printed and posted up in the usual public places.

The Bishop, President and Governor.

Oporto, 20th June, 1808.

AMERICA.

NEW YORK, JUNE 1.—We are informed, that on Monday last the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia received an answer from the President of the United States, to their application for permission to export provisions to one of the West India Islands. As the subject is interesting, it is expected that the address to and the answer from the President will both be published. We shall at present only state, that the permission to export has been decidedly refused.

JUNE 4.—Since the arrival of the United States sloop of war Wasp, at Passamaquoddy, a great number of boats have been seized smuggling flour. The vessels there which have not discharged their cargoes, will take them away again. Flour, &c. which is landed, is not allowed to be taken away unless bonds are given, and the amount thereof in specie deposited at the Custom-house. All the stores are strictly guarded, and no sale for flour at any price. The Agent of Government, who was sent there to execute the laws, has been taken into custody by the Commanding Officer of the Wasp, as being concerned in smuggling.

It is now reduced to a melancholy fact (says a Rutland, Vermont, paper of May 28), that a set of unprincipled speculators, on and about Lake Champlain, are determined to oppose and evade the embargo-law at all events. The interposition of a small detachment of the militia, which is now about to be made, we believe, will disperse these transgressors of our laws, and induce them to return to their respective homes.

JUNE 6.—From the Virginia Herald, published at Fredericksburg, we learn, says The Walsingham Federalist, that the best flour may be purchased here at the ruinous and almost unprecedented price of three dollars per barrel.

This intelligence we conceive to be both important and interesting—Important, because it proves to demonstration the evil of this fatal embargo.

PROVINCIALS.

We have accounts from different parts of the country, communicating numerous distressing consequences of the late extraordinary heat of the weather. A man, at Corby, Lincolnshire, on Wednesday se'nnight, while hoeing thistles, was so overcome by the heat that he died in the field.—A woman employed in making hay in a field adjoining the town of Huntingdon, complained of being ill from the heat, and died before she could get home.—A woman at Belleedon, in Leicestershire, on Wednesday, died of the excessive heat.—Two haymakers, who had been working in a field near Hampstead, were found dead; and three persons, belonging to the same place, are suffering so severely from the same cause, as to render their recovery doubtful.—The horses in Mr. Patterson's carriage, going to Cromer, stopped on the road, unable to proceed, and on unharnessing them, one fell lifeless.—Two horses in the mail coach, between Grantham and Newark, died while in harness.—One of the horses in the Yarmouth coach died on stopping at Norwich.—Two horses belonging to Mr. Fawcett, of the George Inn, Stamford; and one the property of Mr. Roodhouse, of the same place, died on the road; as did a post-horse belonging to Mr. Bone, of Dereham, in Norfolk.

A water-spout lately broke near Kirkconnel, N. B. It is thus described in a letter from Sanquhar:—"In the afternoon, a large black cloud appeared to rest on the hill of Corsencon, which soon shifted and stood over the coal-pits, about two miles from that place, when a whirlwind, apparently rising directly below it, appeared to shake the cloud. At this instant a loud and confused noise was heard, and the water immediately descended with great velocity, in an awful and tremendous manner, tearing up the ground and stones of an immense size, wherever it touched. Those who witnessed this scene describe the water descending from a considerable height, in broken columns rolling over one another, which, when it approached near the earth, terminated in a small point, in an inverted conical shape. The day was uncommonly warm and sultry, scarcely a breath of wind could be felt."

DREADFUL STORM.—On Friday se'nnight, about nine in the evening, there was a storm, near Glastonbury, in Somersetshire, in its appearance and consequences exceeding any thing that has, for a long series of years, been known to this country. The thunder and lightning were tremendous; and the shower of hail, which formed a part of this tremendous phenomenon, was of a nature which would scarcely justify belief, if we had not a perfect confidence in the Gentleman who communicated the account. The storm appeared to have spent its chief fury between Piper's Inn, on the road from Wells to Bridgewater, and the village of Ashgate. Here the corn was laid flat; the roads were inundated; the apple-trees, which abound in that country, were stripped not only of their fruit, but of their very leaves; and almost every pane of glass in the latter village was broken. The larger hail-stones, which were of an irregular form, measured six inches in circumference; and the lesser ones, or rather balls of ice, were about half that size. The inhabitants were so much alarmed at this extraordinary visitation, that they trembled for their lives; and few of them, to use their own expression, expected to behold the return of day.

THE EXPEDITIONS TO SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

Sir Arthur Wellesley's army has sailed, and by this time is not far from the coasts of Spain and Portugal. The army from the Baltic is also preparing to sail.

Sir John Moore was on Friday to have resigned the command of his army to Lieutenant-General Sir Harry Burrard, of the Guards. It is understood that the arrival of Sir Harry and Lord Paget will be the signal for the fleet's sailing.

The army from Kent is hourly expected at Portsmouth, the least shift of wind will bring it there, and it will be expedited thence with the same speed as the Baltic army.

A fourth expedition of considerable force is talked of, and volunteers to it are expected from the Militia and Volunteer corps; most of the line regiments for it will come from Ireland.

The expedition lately gone, and now starting, consists of—

Sir Arthur Wellesley's Division—Royal Artillery and Engineers, 20th Dragoons, 5th, 9th, 36th, 38th, 40th, 45th, 60th (Rifle Battalion), 71st (Highlanders), 91st ditto, 95th or Rifle Corps; the 4th Veteran Battalion to relieve the 42d or Royal Highlanders, who join from Gibraltar—in all, with Commissariat, 11,500 men.

Lieutenant-General Sir John Moore's Division—Royal Artillery, Royal Engineers, Royal Staff Corps, 4th or King's Own (Lord Chatham's Regiment), 28th, 52d a Battalion, 79th or Cameron Highlanders, 92d or Gordon Highlanders, 95th Rifle Corps, and 7 German Regiments—in all about 12,000 men.

The Army from Kent—Royal Artillery, 7th Light Dragoons, 14th, 18th, a brigade of Foot Guards, 2d or Queen's Regiment, 9th, 43d Light, 52d a battalion—about 6000 men.

Friday a detachment of the Life Guards marched into Portsmouth, in charge of four very large waggons of treasure, proceeding with the army to Spain and Portugal.

This Day is published, in one Volume Octavo, extra Boards, price 6s.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

RUPTURE BETWEEN AUSTRIA AND FRANCE, AND THE DEPARTURE OF THE FRENCH AMBASSADOR FROM VIENNA.

The following important letter from Hamburgh was transmitted to us just as our Paper was going to press. We give it to our readers without comment: but the respectability of the person who has communicated it, leaves us no reason to doubt its authenticity:—

"HAMBURGH, JULY 19, 1808.

"Every one here is in the greatest agitation in consequence of accounts received yesterday from Vienna. ANDREOSSY, the French Ambassador, not having received satisfactory reparation for the insult given to his Master, by the EMPEROR having ordered prayers to be offered up in all the Churches for the safety of the POPE, is said to have used the most insolent language to Count STADION, the Minister for Foreign Affairs. The latter has always been a decided enemy of the French. The personal invectives directed against him by the French Government, which appeared in The Moniteur immediately after the peace of Presburg, have not contributed to weaken this aversion. In consequence of his spirited and dignified reply to the French Ambassador, the latter threatened to quit Vienna. A few days after this circumstance had occurred, ANDREOSSY received a Courier from Bayonne, and immediately demanded an audience of the EMPEROR himself, which was declined under the pretext of indisposition, and he was referred to Count STADION. But whether he refused, in consequence of the late violent altercation, to confer with the Minister for Foreign Affairs, or whether he acted in conformity to orders from BONAPARTE, is not known; however, certain it is, that he then addressed himself to the Archduke CHARLES, who declined every kind of interference, on the plan of incompetency, and from his unwillingness to break in on the department of a Minister, who enjoyed in the most distinguished manner the confidence of the EMPEROR. The most extraordinary circumstance in this important transaction is the knowledge which the public immediately acquired of it—whether by the connivance of the Austrian Government, which perhaps was willing to feel the public pulse, or through the indiscretion of ANDREOSSY, remains a mystery. It has, however, produced a very great fermentation in Vienna; and if the Austrian Cabinet is willing to resist the insatiable ambition of BONAPARTE, it is now fully convinced that the public feel the greatest horror at the perfidious treatment of the POPE and the ROYAL FAMILY of SPAIN. They expressed their indignation so strongly as to hoot some persons belonging to the French Embassy. The Government, in consequence of these symptoms, and to prevent a scene similar to that which before had occurred in Vienna, or to avoid the odium of being the aggressor in case of a new war, published a strong Proclamation against any persons, who should be found guilty of circulating disquieting reports concerning a new war—however, without taking the slightest notice of the insult offered to the French Embassy.

"The Ambassador was at last obliged to communicate his dispatches to Count STADION. The same day a Cabinet Council assembled, at which the EMPEROR and all the ARCHDUKES, who were in Vienna, attended. This conference lasted from two o'clock till eight in the evening, and upon the breaking up of the Council, couriers were immediately dispatched into all the provinces, to Paris, and likewise one to Petersburgh. The Russian Ambassador, having had the same evening an interview with Count STADION, sent also one to his Court. Nothing had transpired which could satisfy the curiosity of the public relative to this extraordinary dispatch of Couriers, and what encreased the anxiety, was a report that was spread the following day, that they were packing up at the French Ambassador's Hotel.

"The inhabitants here in Hamburgh display the most extravagant joy since these accounts have been received from Vienna. Several merchants received yesterday evening letters on this subject, all containing, with the greatest exactness, the same intelligence. In every Coffee-house, in every public place, the Citizens already express their hopes of a new Continental War with as much freedom, as if there was not a Frenchman in Hamburgh. What confirms this important information is the conduct observed by the French Minister and Governor: you know these gentlemen are neither dilatory nor conscientious in their measures; but now they appear to be absolutely panic struck. Some of the letters go so far as to assert that ANDREOSSY, after the conference with Count STADION, had demanded passports for himself and all the persons attached to the Embassy—and received them the same evening!!!

"I must conclude as B—— is setting out this very evening for Heligoland. Heaven knows; how long this poor fellow will succeed in this dangerous business.——I am, &c.

"I break open the letter to inform you, that BERNADOTTE and the French Minister have received Estafettes about two hours ago. It is said, they have brought intelligence that ANDREOSSY with all his suite has quitted Vienna!"

Every account from Spain contributes to raise our opinion of that gallant nation. Their success is equal to the justice of their cause; and very little doubt can be entertained of their ultimately succeeding in driving from their country their detestable invaders. It is impossible to bestow too high encomiums on their magnanimous resistance. Every Briton, every man who knows how to appreciate the inestimable blessings of liberty, will feel his heart dilate with pleasure on reading the last accounts from that country. They corroborate the opinion we always entertained, that the success of the French was less owing to their own prowess, than to the ignorance and imbecility of the Governments of the States they subjected. These weak, unprincipled Cabinets, entertained too much jealousy, or too contemptible an opinion of their subjects. With sentiments like these it was impossible for them to have recourse to the united and irresistible exertions of the people, in case of a defeat of their army. However, the success of the Spaniards will be productive of this great and inestimable advantage, that every Government possesses a fund of internal resources, in case of an invasion, which will oppose a stronger bound to ambition than was ever before thought of. It will teach Governments to entertain more esteem for their subjects, and impress on their minds the salutary conviction, that their true greatness and power consist in the affections of their people. We already see the dawn of a happier day for Europe. We already anticipate the salutary change which the renovation of Spain must effect in every State. That magnanimous nation, in learning to esteem themselves from the consciousness of how much they will have done, will feel an indignant horror at the very idea of becoming again the abject slaves of Priests and Kings. After having driven beyond the Pyrenees, the hitherto invincible soldiers of BONAPARTE, they will feel in their bosoms a sense of conscious dignity and worth, that they will not be able to comprehend their former passive submission. They have already declared their intention of new modelling their Government, or rather of bringing it back to its ancient purity; and whilst a junto of traitors and cowards is discussing at Bayonne the motley constitution of BONAPARTE, they are giving unequivocal proofs of their capacity of forming one for themselves, and of maintaining it.

The intelligence from Portugal is equally gratifying. The divine flame of freedom has seized the Portuguese likewise, and it now spreads with irresistible violence over the two countries. Their detestation of the common enemy has effaced every trace of ancient animosity and jealousy. They seem to form but one people; and the names of Portuguese and Spaniard, instead of awakening their former national enmity, only serve to stimulate mutual exertion. We are anxious to hear of our Expeditions arriving on their shores; for there never was an example of greater unanimity among the inhabitants of the two islands, relative to any public transaction, than on the necessity of assisting our new allies.

The people of Ireland are as zealous as the people of this country. Both yeomanry and militia have enthusiastically come forward to offer their services for Spain; and this generous effusion of patriotism, on this important occasion, proves that the majority of the people deserve the emancipation they solicited.

The accounts from Sweden speak of new successes against the Russians. His SWEDISH MAJESTY has departed for Finland, in the intention, as some assert, of having a personal interview with ALEXANDER. The affairs of Spain are said to have produced a total alteration in the Russian councils; and if we can give credit to letters from Memel, a Russian army is already marching into Poland. However, every account from the North justifies us to draw the conclusion that Russia will not be so indifferent to her own interests and dignity, as to see with indifference the perfidious conduct of Bonaparte towards the Royal Family of Spain.

Sir JOHN MOORE's departure was not suspected till the evening of the second day after he quitted Stockholm. We are happy to state that every man, even those who are the nearest to his SWEDISH MAJESTY, completely acquit Sir JOHN MOORE of all blame in the conferences which he had with the KING. The propositions made by his SWEDISH MAJESTY for the employment of the British troops in the Baltic are said to have been totally incompatible with the instructions Sir JOHN MOORE had received.

INSURRECTION IN PARIS.

Every private intelligence we receive from the Continent, confirms the account we communicated in our last, of the strong indignation manifested by every description of people in France, against the abominable perfidy of BONAPARTE towards the Spaniards. However, it is not from the character or energy of the Parisians that we expect any resistance to his iniquitous proceedings. These effeminate Sybarites would feel more sympathy and distress in consequence of an indisposition of Mademoiselle GEORGE, or their divine DUPORT, than at the massacre of half the inhabitants of Madrid. But our Journalists, from a total ignorance of the moral apathy of the despicable inhabitants of Paris, have entertained the public with the energy they begin all at once to display.

We know that they have never displayed this energy or resolution but in the murder of the few praise-worthy characters that appeared in the beginning of their Revolution, Where was their energy during the loathsome tyranny exercised by the exocrable MARAT and ROBESPIERRE? and where was their energy, when a still more execrable ruffian, their present Tyrant, murdered with grape-shot 1800 of them, near the Church of St. Roch? or, where was their vaunted energy, when the same murderer of their fellow-citizens, arrested and banished MOREAU? Nothing is so repugnant and disgusting than such gross ignorance: not that we doubt of their detestation of BONAPARTE; We know they detest him; but we know they have neither courage nor virtue to resist his tyranny; and that as long as he allows them to dance, they will prudently restrain their hatred within the very circumspect bounds of a dull innendo, or at most, of a languid sarcasm. But there are other parts of France from whence resistance may be expected, and effectual resistance. As soon as the gens d'armerie are called off, which, with every respect for the great local knowledge of the Editors of The Morning Chronicle, are far from resembling our watchmen, but are, on the contrary, the finest body of men in France—we say, as soon as the gens d'armerie are called off, the departments along the Loire, in ancient Britanny, in the South of France, but particularly in Lyons, and the other manufacturing cities, whose principal trade was with Spain, will shew their dissatisfaction with the present order of things. They detest BONAPARTE; they have some energy, and are mostly attached to the Bourbons. They have given unequivocal proofs of this attachment about seven years ago, when the Prince of Parma travelled from Paris to Tuscany, to take possession of his new Sovereignty. Wherever he appeared, he was treated with enthusiasm, on account of his relationship to the Bourbons. But it is a mark of the grossest ignorance of the character of the Parisians, to expect any thing great or good from them.

If BONAPARTE falls, he falls a victim to the Senate or his Generals. As soon as they find the situation of France dangerous, they will sacrifice him, but not by means of an insurrection, but by assassination. There is not a Senator, not a General, not one of the privileged ruffians, who are nearest to his heart, and enjoy his confidence most, who do not detest him as a stranger: and however they may fawn to him now, they have too frequently felt their self-love mortified by his brutal domineering character, as not to seize, with avidity, an opportunity of sacrificing him, as soon as they can do it with prudence.

SPANISH TROOPS IN THE ISLAND OF FUHNEN.

Accounts from the Continent, for the last three or four weeks, all coincide in stating, that a considerable part of the Spanish Army lies in the Island of Fuhnen. It would be astonishing, if no measures had been as yet adopted to enlighten them, relative to the late occurrences in their country. An omission of that kind would be highly unpardonable. However, it is not yet too late to take effectual measures to prevent, at least, their quitting that Island. Though the commanders may be traitors to their country, as their nomination was probably recommended by BONAPARTE, it is, however, reasonable to conclude that the soldiers and the greater part of the officers will be animated with the same indignation, which the rest of the Spanish Army displayed, when they are acquainted with the perfidious treatment of their Sovereign and family.—Under these circumstances we know no measure more adviseable, or which is more likely to be attended with success, than if some of the Spanish Noblemen now in London were to go to the Baltic. They would easily find an opportunity of communicating to them the present situation of their country. And we have no doubt from the detestation the Spaniards have always felt for the French, that they would soon follow the glorious example set by the rest of their countrymen. As we see no reasonable ground for not drawing this conclusion, measures should be immediately resorted to in order to rescue them from their present situation, and to transport them to their country. Even the very circumstance of confining them in Fuhnen, is a strong presumption that BONAPARTE distrusts them; and that he is apprehensive of removing them to any part of the Continent, notwithstanding the danger of leaving them where they are, from a well-grounded fear, that a revolt on their part, may easily spread to his Dutch, Italian, and German auxiliaries. This is the only satisfactory reason we can assign for this unaccountable negligence of the wary usurper. These precautions on his part, which reduce him to the necessity of leaving so considerable a division unemployed, is a strong proof of the observations in our last Number, of the little assistance he expects from his vassals; and are more convincing than any one account received as yet from the Continent, of the precarious and even desperate state of his affairs.

Fuhnen is a small Island, and may be easily blockaded. The capital, which is Odensee, lies in the middle of the Island, and contains about 7 or 8,000 inhabitants; it is situated about 7 or 8 miles from the coast of Jutland, and lies between the two Belts. In case our suggestion relative to a mission of the Spanish Noblemen, should be adopted, we would strongly recommend the necessity of sending, at the same time, a sufficient number of transports to convoy them to the assistance of their gallant countrymen. It would be highly impolitic to make any overture without this precaution, as the enmity of the Danes, and the measures which BERNADOTTE may adopt, would afterwards raise insurmountable obstacles. This circumstance is certainly worthy the earliest attention of Government; and we hope when they take it into consideration, they will proceed with that promptitude which can alone insure it success.

Letters from Gibraltar state, that Sebastiani had positively quitted Constantinople, and that a Russian ambassador, when on his way to Naples, had been recalled by his court. They also mention, that an expedition is fitting out in Malta, to act in the Mediterranean.

Government has issued orders for the immediate shipment of 10,000 barrels of powder, for Spain; each barrel is to weigh 100lb. weight.

On Wednesday two waggons, loaded with dollars, were taken from the Bank, to proceed to Portsmouth, and be forwarded from thence to Spain.

About six tons of hats, cockades, and shoes, have been sent off from London to Gijou, for the use of the Spanish Patriots.

INTERESTING ADVICES FROM THE SPANISH PATRIOTS.

The accounts from Spain and Portugal still continue to be of a nature highly satisfactory. The Orestes sloop of war is arrived at Plymouth, from the Mediterranean, having received dispatches in her way from our Commanders at Cadiz, and off the coast of Portugal. The following official Bulletins were in consequence issued by Government, on Monday:—

"Downing-street, July 18.

"Advices from Lord Collingwood, of the 26th of June, state, that accounts had been received that Dupont was in great distress, surrounded on all sides, and disappointed of expected reinforcements. On the 16th, he retired six leagues behind Cordova; the Spanish army advanced. Intelligence had arrived that Dupont had proposed to capitulate, if allowed to pass into France unmolested; but nothing short of unconditional surrender would be accepted. Dupont had retired to Andujas. Castanos's outposts were at Aldia de Rio, within two miles of the enemy's rear. The whole regular force under Castanos, amounts to 21,300 infantry, 2,500 cavalry, and a formidable train of artillery."

"Downing-Street, July 18.

"Letters have been received at this Office from Major-General Spencer, off Ayamonte, dated the 25th and 26th of June. The Major-General was on his return to Cadiz, from off the southern coast of Portugal, where he left the Portuguese flag flying along the whole extent of coast of the province of Algarva, in all the forts and batteries.

"The Spanish frontier on the side of Aymonte, had remained perfectly secure since the British force had approached that coast, and the detachments of the enemy's force, which on General Spencer's arrival had retired to Villa Real and Castromaris, have since surrendered themselves, with the above-mentioned places, to the Portuguese troops."

The following Official Bulletin, was circulated in all the political circles on Monday evening:—

"Foreign Office, Tuesday, three o'clock.

"Mr. West has just arrived from Coruna, accompanied by Signior Fermin Vicere. They left Coruna on the 9th of July, when an official account had arrived there of the defeat of General Lefevre, by General Palafox, on the 25th of June, two leagues from Saragossa The force under the French General consisted of eight thousand men, who, after a severe action of several hours, surrendered to the Spanish General. The impenetrants, of the peasantry, however, was such, that they afterwards rushed on, and with their arma blanca (knives and swords) put every Frenchman to death.

"The Portuguese are said to be marching with a numerous army to attack General Junot."

Dispatches were yesterday morning received at the Admiralty, from our Squadron cruizing off the Northern Coast of Spain, dated the 15th inst. which contain the gratifying intelligence of the recapture of St. Andero. It appears that General Ponte, who commands a division of the Patriotic Army, having formed the plan of retaking that place, advanced towards it with between three and four thousand men, and concerted a plan of attack with some of our ships of war that were cruizing off the coast. The French in St. Andero, about 1600 men, did not, however, think it prudent to wait for an attack, for, about two o'clock in the morning of the 12th inst. they evacuated the town, having first levied a heavy contribution on the inhabitants, and destroyed all the arms in the place.

The part of the Asturian force under Gen. Ponte and the Bishop of Andero, amounts to about 18,000 men, but the whole Asturian army amounts to above 40,000 men; and it was generally expected that an action would take place between it and Marshal Bessieres's army, which amounts to about 16,000 men, near Bilboa, of the result of which very little doubt was entertained. General Cuesta had advanced to Villepande, and had taken possession of the Bridge at Mayorca, and on the Seco; his intention was to make an attack upon Valadolid, in which there was a small French force, for the purpose of cutting off all communication between Burgos, at which there was a French corps of 18,000 men, and Madrid.

Murat still remains entrenched at Reteiro, with about five thousand men. Joseph Bonaparte has at length ventured into his new dominions; he entered Biscay the beginning of this month, with about four thousand men; he was at Bilboa on the 9th, at Toloso on the 10th, and when the last accounts came away he was at Vittoria. He was apparently afraid to proceed farther, from the cool and contemptuous reception he every where met with.

CONFIRMATION OF THE DEFEAT OF THE FRENCH ARMY COMMANDED BY GENERAL MONCEY, OF THE EXTERMINATION OF THAT OF GENERAL LEFEVRE, AND OF THE DEFEAT OF THE ENEMY NEAR BARCELONA—MARCH OF GENERAL CUESTA AGAINST MADRID—PERILOUS SITUATION OF MURAT—INEVITABLE SURRENDER OF THE ARMY OF GEN. DUPONT—THE DIVISION SENT TO REINFORCE HIM FROM MADRID DEFEATED AND PUT TO FLIGHT—THE FORTS OF FIGUERAS AND BELLEGARDE TAKEN BY THE PATRIOTS—GEN. SPENCER ADVANCED INTO SPAIN, TO CO-OPERATE WITH THE PATRIOTS, &c.

Accounts were yesterday evening received from Cadiz, of the 7th inst. which state that the Supreme Junta, at Seville, had received advices from Valentia, confirming the important intelligence of the defeat of the French Army commanded by Gen. Moncey. It appears that he had cannonaded and vigorously assailed the city of Valentia for upwards of seven hours, but the intrepidity and valour of the brave Patriots ultimately prevailed, and the enemy, defeated by the well-directed fire of the patriots, made a precipitate retreat, leaving behind them their numerous dead, and greatly embarrassed by the number of their wounded. In the utmost consternation and distress, the remains of the enemy took the route of Almanza, and the necessary measures were promptly taken by the Patriots to cut off their retreat, and effect their entire destruction. Their killed and wounded were immense. Among the prisoners were General Berthier and his Aid-de-Camp, who were conveyed to Valentia.

Accounts had also been received from Catalonia, confirming the intelligence of the defeat of the enemy, near Barcelona, with the addition that General Segi was either killed or desperately wounded, It was further announced, that the Catalan peasants had been joined by those of Rouillon, and that the forts of Figueras and Bellegarde were in the hands of the Patriots.

General Castanos was advancing against General Dupont, who continued at Andujar, expecting reinforcements, which, according to some of the advices we have received, were attacked on their way and defeated by the Patriots. A letter from Cadiz, states the force which was thus intercepted at 5000 men; that it was completely beaten, and compelled to fall back upon Madrid, with considerable loss. One hundred waggons, and 1000 prisoners, fell into the hands of the Patriots. It is also certain that Dupont has been disappointed of the reinforcements he expected from Portugal; that his army is in the greatest distress for want of provisions; and General Moncey having been defeated, the speedy surrender, or total extermination of Dupont's army becomes inevitable. General Cuesta is in full march with his gallant army against Madrid, where Murat, with his reduced force, is in the most perilous situation; and the private accounts add, that "another body of the French have been destroyed in Valdepenas, and about 3000 more at Valladolid, "which city they attempted to pillage."—The same accounts state, that Moncey's army consisted of 15,000 men, nearly the whole of whom have been destroyed.—General Spencer had advanced with part of his corps to Xeres to co-operate with the brave Spaniards.

The Private Communication from Cadiz is of the utmost importance, and is derived from a source of the highest respectability. It is as follows:—

"CADIZ, JULY 7.—The news we daily receive here is of the most favourable description. From the French frontier to Saragossa more than 17,000 Frenchmen have perished. At Saragossa upwards of 12,000 were killed by the sword, and those which were saved from the fury of our troops effected it only by flinging themselves into the river Ebro.

"It is impossible that a single man of DUPONT's army can escape, although that General has not yet surrendered. A reinforcement of 5000 men which were on their march to join him, have been beaten and compelled to return to Madrid, from whence they began the march. They lost one hundred and sixty waggons laden with ammunition, and had upwards of 1000 men taken prisoners, from one moment to another we expect to hear of DUPONT's unconditional surrender; for, although he has entrenched himself in Andujar, yet we know he is in the greatest distress for provisions, and cannot hold out long; nor can his army, which it is generally believed does not exceed 7000 men, effect any thing against that by which he is surrounded. He has already offered to capitulate, on being allowed to return to France, with the liberty of taking with him four covered waggons. The Spaniards continue to adhere most rigidly to their determination of giving no quarter. It was understood that the Patriot Generals had pledged themselves to each other to meet, at the head of their respective columns, at Madrid, on St. James's day (Monday the 25th inst.) there to celebrate the feast of their tutelar Saint, in a manner worthy the great occasion which called them there.

"The French are beaten in every direction; General Moncey, who was sent against Valencia with 15,000 men, has been defeated, HIMSELF KILLED in the action, and we are assured, that scarcely any of this army have escaped.

MALAGA, JUNE 22.—The French Consul, and all the French inhabitants of this city, were, on the 4th instant, shut up in the Moorish Castle Gibralforo, with a view to save themselves from the impending fury of the populace, and until the 20th, no disorder of any kind was committed, but on that day, the people having obtained intelligence that a warehouse, rented by the French Consul in the suburbs, contained a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition, (which, in fact, were taken from the English) they, conceiving that this was a depôt, secretly collected to await the arrival of the French, proceeded in a considerable body, and in defiance of the attempts of the Deputy Governor to undeceive them, demanded the French Consul; the Guards resisted, but the people broke through them and entered the castle, from whence they drew forth their victim, and instantly stabbed, and dissected his body as that of a traitor.—After parading the city they returned again to the house of the French Consul, which they proceeded in the first place to strip of every thing moveable, and then set fire to it; and whilst it was burning furiously, the mob threw into the flames all that remained of the body of the French Consul. This scene being concluded, the people returned again to the Castle of Gibralforo, from whence they drew forth a French Merchant, who they instantly destroyed, in nearly the same manner as the Consul, and consigned his remains to the same flames. The warehouse was afterwards broke open, and the whole contents destroyed.

These scenes took place in defiance of the interference of the Government of the town. An expedient was at length resorted to, which produced the desired effect. The Dean and Chapter met, and agreed on the instant formation of a religious procession, for the purpose of exhorting the mob to return to their homes. This was accomplished, and produced the effect desired; and in the evening of the same day, before sun-set, peace was completely restored.

FROM THE PORTUGUESE PATRIOTS.

Most important and gratifying communications were on Tuesday made to the Portugese Ambassador from Oporto. They were brought by an armed schooner, commanded by Capt. Francisco Gonclave Da Costa, who left Oporto on the 11th inst. The dispatches, of which he is the bearer, are from the Bishop who is at the head of the Provisional Government at Oporto. They announce the arrival of Colonel Brown, at Oporto, after a passage of five days from England. His mission was partly to make a tender of British assistance, of which the Portuguese immediately availed themselves. They have requested arms, ammunition, and money. There is scarcely a man in the north of Portugal, who has not made a voluntary tender of his services to march against the French Those who are possessed of arms have already been incorporated with regulars, and have marched against the enemy. Loison, who according to the last accounts had advanced to Armazante, had retreated to Mizaofrio, about six leagues from Armazante, where he had entrenched himself, but was soon surrounded by the Patriotic Bands, who cut off all his means of procuring provisions. In this state he requested permission to be allowed time to draw up terms, upon which he would consent to capitulate. His request was complied with; and in a few hours he sent in a flag of truce, assuring the Leaders of the Patriots that he would surrender his army to any General Officer of the Portuguese army. He did this to save the effusion of blood; being acquainted with the determination of the Portuguese people to shew no quarter.

This agreeable task was consigned by the Patriots to General Bernardine Friere, who is now at the head of the Portuguese army in the North of Portugal, and who had proceeded to Mizaofrio to receive the capitulation of Loison. In this army Laborde has a command: he is the person who was at the head of the detachment directed to put to death the few persons in Lisbon, who had been taken up for betraying a disposition to revolt against the doctrines of the French on their first entrance into Lisbon. The Patriots, it is said, had protested against the life of Laborde. Bernardine Friere is a General of most distinguished merit; he served under General Forbes at Rosillon: on the entry of the French he resigned his commission in the Portuguese army, and refused to serve in that of France. Every Patriot in Portugal wears a cockade, which has this inscription —"For our Prince Regent, and revenge against our enemies;" the women and children wear a black crape, on which is the word "Vengeance." Those who refuse to wear this insignia are considered traitors. 200,000*l.* part of the exacted contribution of the French, in Oporto, had been discovered, and secured by the Provisional Government, in the house of Josef de Souza Mello. Other large sums had been secured in two other houses, raised by similar exactions. At St. Ube's, the Patriots had put to death upwards of 500 Frenchmen; and they had determined not to leave a Frenchman alive in the North of Portugal. A similar massacre is said to have taken place at Algarve. At Sardao, a body of Portuguese marched eleven leagues in one day, in very hot weather, and through the worst of roads, to attack 900 Frenchmen; they fell in with them and put nearly the whole to death.

A plot had been discovered, in which many of the Frenchified inhabitants of Oporto were concerned; and the city would have been burnt to ashes, but for a seasonable detection of the diabolical design. The Portuguese engaged in the plot had all been arrested, and were expected to be tried and executed in a few days.

The Monks in Oporto had become soldiers Upwards of 1500 of them took charge of the French prisoners, and disaffected persons, who were in confinement, and performed their duty with zeal and alacrity.

Several proclamations had been issued, tending to inspirit the people, and exhorting them to extirpate the enemy of the human race.

Extract of a Letter from an Officer, come Home in Le Gloire.

"We have just come in from Lisbon; the whole of our crew, and every other we have met with, are in high spirits at the happy prospect before us, as every thing is going on favourable to the Spanish Patriots. Political affairs wear a more pleasing aspect than they have done for a number of years past. The French army, which is estimated at little less than 10,000 men, is completely hemmed in at Lisbon; and all those I have conversed with upon the subject have no doubt will fall an easy prey to General Sir Arthur Wellesley, whose fleet of transports we fell in with at sea, on Sunday, the 17th inst. off Sicily.

"The brave Sir Charles Cotton has summoned the Russian fleet, in the Tagus, to surrender to the British flag; but, strange to say, the Russian Admiral, in his answer, discovered much violence, as well as national and individual enmity to Great Britain, and declared he would rather burn every ship under his command than surrender them. I have the pleasure to say we landed great quantities of arms and ammunition at Lagos Bay, and Oporto, for the use of the brave Spaniards. We are now in possession of some batteries. Sir C. Cotton has nine sail of the line lying under the Rock, the crews of them are waiting with the greatest anxiety possible to be brought into action.

"The Russian fleet, lying in the Tagus, consists of nine sail of the line and one frigate.

"We were informed at Lisbon, from a quarter that was not to be doubted, in fact as it was generally understood, that the English and Spanish fleets were lying together at Minorca.

"We have brought to England Rear-Admiral Obnay, together with a great number of French prisoners, taken by the Portuguese. Among them is that celebrated character, Monsieur Prigny, Commandant of the French Marine at Oporto; he is distinguished as a Member of the Legion of Honour; he was Captain of the Fleet in the memorable Battle of Trafalgar, in which he signalized himself. We have likewise Monsieur Guimbaud, the late French Consul at Oporto, whose house was completely gutted by the populace at Oporto, himself made prisoner, together with the Commandant of Marine, and a vast number of officers of the French army. There is little or no doubt, either of the taking or destruction of the Russian fleet; in fact, it appears inevitable."

Extract of two Letters received on the 22d of this Month, by his Excellency the Portuguese Minister, from Mr. Patrick Farral, the Portuguese Agent at Gibraltar:

"Gibraltar, June 30.

"I have the honour to inform your Excellency, that on the 16th of this month the whole kingdom Algarve rose against the French, proclaiming his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, our Master, for their only true and legitimate Sovereign: the French Governor, and all those of that nation, holding public situations under him, were made prisoners. Many of the French were killed; the rest, throwing down their arms, sought their safety in a shameful flight. A Supreme Junta is already established in Faro, the capital of that kingdom, in the name of his Royal Highness, which is composed of the following persons:—

President—His Excellency the Count of Castro Marim.

Vice-President—His Excellency the Bishop of Algarve.

For the Clergy—The Rev. the Arch Dean of the See and the Rev. Antonio Louis de Macedo.

For the Nobility—Dorembargadoe Joze Duarte da Silva Negrao, Joze Bernardo de Gama, and Joaquim Pelipe de Landreaete.

For the People—Miguel de O, the younger, Captain of the Ordenances, and Joan Aleixo.

Secretary—Doctor Ventura.

"The Junta is occupied in preparing with the greatest activity the means of completing this heroic undertaking. An Express has just arrived here from Taviras from his Excellency the Count of Castro Marim, requesting arms, &c. from the Governor of this place, who sent what arms, powder, and shot he could spare, having sent large quantities to Spain. Messengers have also arrived here from Silves and Faro, making the same request, but which could not be complied with, the Governor not having any to spare. The Portuguese Officers who were there, waiting an opportunity to go to Brazils, have returned, full of joy, to join their regiments in Algarve."

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday, about twelve o'clock, his Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace from Windsor. At three o'clock his Majesty held a private Levee, which was attended by a Deputation from the Corporation of the City of London, to present an Address.

ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY.

The Court of Common Council of the City of London presented their Address to his Majesty, which was read by the Recorder:

Digitized by Google

" TO THE KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

" The humble, dutiful, and loyal Address of the Lord " Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, " in Common Council assembled.

" Most Gracious Sovereign,

" We your Majesty's loyal subjects, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled, with hearts full of dutiful affection to your Royal Person, and inseparably attached to the honour and prosperity of your Government, humbly desire to approach your throne, and represent to your Majesty the sentiments of a free and faithful people.

" While we contemplate with horror and indignation, the atrocious perfidy and wanton violence employed by the Ruler of France to reduce under his yoke the Spanish Monarchy and the Spanish People, we cannot refrain from expressing our joy and exultation at the pure and animating spirit of patriotism, displayed by that high-minded and gallant nation, in defence of their dearest rights and privileges. They have appealed to the generous feelings of your Majesty for protection and support, and they have not appealed in vain. You, Sire, have felt as the Sovereign of a free people, who, by extending his powerful aid to a nation struggling for liberty and independence, holds forth to the world a happy and practical illustration of the blessings which his own subjects enjoy.

" The solemn declaration by which your Majesty has been pleased to recognize the Spanish nation, as a natural friend and ally against the common enemy of all established Governments; the frank, disinterested, and inspiriting pledge which you have given that you have no other object than that of preserving unimpaired the integrity and independence of the Spanish monarchy; the wisdom, liberality, and promptitude of the measures consequently adopted by your Majesty's Government, have excited in our breasts the most lively and grateful sensations.

" We have to entreat your Majesty's acceptance of our most cordial thanks for the noble and liberal system of policy by which your councils have been, and continue to be, actuated towards Spain; and we beg leave to assure you, that, in contributing to the success of you royal interposition in a cause at once so great and glorious, and so peculiarly congenial to the spirit and feelings of your people, no exertion shall be withheld, no sacrifice shall be spared on our part to prevent twelve millions of fellow-freemen from being accursed with the most galling and profligate despotism recorded in the history of the world.

" In the measures which your Majesty may think proper to adopt for accomplishing this great end, you may, Sire, rely with the firmest confidence upon the affectionate, zealous, and enthusiastic support of your loyal Citizens of London. We feel ourselves identified with the Patriots of Spain; we sympathize in all their wants; we participate in all their wishes; and we humbly beg leave to express our fervent hope, that the glorious struggle in which the Spanish nation is engaged, aided by the energies, resources, and magnanimity of the British Empire, may succeed, not only in asserting the independence of the Spanish Monarchy, but in ultimately effecting, under the protection of Divine Providence, the emancipation of Europe, and the re-establishment of the blessings of Peace."

Lord Hawkesbury, as Secretary of State for the Home Department, read the following appropriate reply:

" I thank you for your very loyal and dutiful Address. I accept with pleasure your congratulations on the prospect opened to the world by the brave and loyal exertions of the Spanish nation against the tyranny and usurpation of France, and on the re-establishment of Peace between Great Britain and Spain.

" In aiding the efforts of the Spanish Nation, I have been actuated by no other motive than that of affording the most effectual and disinterested assistance to a people struggling for the maintenance of their ancient Government and national independence.

" I have no doubt I shall continue to receive from you, and from all classes of my people, the same zealous and affectionate support which I have experienced on so many and on such important occasions."

They were all very graciously received, and had the honour to kiss his Majesty's hand.

After the Deputation retired, the following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:

Captain Sir C. Brisbane, on his receiving the honour of Knighthood abroad.

Captain Sir J. Gore, on his return to England, by Lord Mulgrave.

The Rev. Dr. Plumtree, by the Earl of Bathurst, on his being appointed Dean of Gloucester.

His Majesty gave audiences to the Cabinet Ministers present, and Mr. Ryder, the Judge-Advocate General. His Majesty set off on his return to Windsor about six o'clock.

THE LATE ELOPEMENT.

The last fashionable elopement from the vicinity of Barco Regis was attended by circumstances peculiarly distressing.—Lady E. B. the daughter of a certain Countess, was married about two years since to Mr. B. a Gentleman then possessing very considerable landed property in the West Indies. As this was a tie of inclination, and not of necessity, it was generally expected among the friends of the parties, that the union would prove a happy one, particularly as the husband was not addicted to any of those little indiscretions now so prevalent among our young men in high life! The Lady had nothing but her youth and beauty to recommend her, and they were deemed sufficiently recommendatory; and as she was supposed to have but little inclination to launch into fashionable follies, they were inducements sufficient to decide Mr. B. in his choice of a wife.—Since marriage, the parties lived in a state of connubial felicity, until a passion for play on the one side, and a careless indifference on the other, producing a disunion of sentiments, had enabled Mr. H—y, a Gentleman, (an intimate friend of the Lady's mother) to destroy the peace of both for ever. A few days since the Lady acquainted her husband that she wished to go to the west end of the town to make a few purchases: he assented. Lady E. B. stepped into a hackney-coach, and ordered the man to drive to Bond-street. In the Haymarket, however, she pulled the check-string, got out, and discharged the vehicle. Here the Lady met Mr. H. and proceeded in another coach to the Key, in Chandos-street. All these proceedings were detected by the confidential servant of the husband: the latter, suspecting that something was wrong, took the precautionary measures alluded to. The man, thus presuming on the supposed discovery of his mistress's infidelity, ran with all possible speed to an eminent Solicitor residing in Golden-square. Finding him at home, they returned together to the Key, at the door of which Hotel they waited until the Lady came out, when the man went up to his mistress, and placed his hand on her shoulder, exclaiming, " Oh, Lady E——y, I am sorry to see you come out of such a house as this!" The Lady fainted from the surprise and fright. Mr. H. took her in his arms and carried her into the coach, which was in waiting, and ordered the driver to proceed, which he did, unmolested by the opposite party.—Since that period, neither the seduced nor the seducer have been heard of. There are some circumstances attached to this case of such peculiar delicacy, that we cannot, consistently with decency, communicate them to our readers.

BREAD.—The Lord Mayor ordered the price of bread to remain as before, the Quartern Loaf of wheaten 12½*d.* and household 10½*d.*

LAW REPORTS.

SHERIFF'S COURT, TUESDAY, JULY 19.

CRIM. CON.

LORD BORINGDON v. SIR ARTHUR PAGET.

Mr. Dampiere shortly stated to the Jury, that this was an inquisition of damages in an action for criminal conversation with the wife of the Plaintiff, in which the Defendant suffered judgment to go by default.

Mr. Park said, it became his duty to state the nature of the case more in detail, and give the Jury the history of the transaction upon which the present case was founded. Lord Boringdon, a Nobleman of considerable rank and fortune, was married about four years ago to his present wife, the daughter of the Earl of Westmorland. At the time of his marriage, he was of the age of thirty-two. The Defendant, Sir Arthur Paget, was also a man of noble family, being the second son of Lord Uxbridge. These parties had, in their youth, been at the same University (Oxford), and he believed they both belonged to the College of Christchurch. The Lady to whom the Plaintiff was united, was the second daughter of the Earl of Westmorland, who, at a very early age, attracted the affections of the Plaintiff. He became acquainted with her in the month of May, 1801, and in the June following they were married.—There was no inequality between them in point of rank or fortune; and he trusted the Jury would not think there was any great inequality in point of age, when he stated that the L. ady was eighteen at the time of her marriage, and her Lord thirty-two. If this disparity of years were, however, to be reckoned as a great inequality, the objection could not come from the mouth of the Defendant, who was two years older than Lord Boringdon, who was now thirty-eight years of age, whereas his Lordship was but thirty-six. Until the month of May in the present year, Lord Boringdon had no reason to suspect the fidelity of his Lady. It was in consequence of Lord Boringdon's speaking to her upon the subject, and pressing her to know whether those surmises were true or not, that Lady Boringdon went off the next day, and had since continued to live in a state of open adultery with the Defendant. During the time that the Plaintiff and his Lady lived together in harmony and affection, there had been a son born, who was now living. He had investigated the circumstances of this case with all the attention that it was his duty to bestow upon it, and he could defy, and he did mean to hold out a defiance to the Defendant, to bring forward an instance in the course of Lord Boringdon's married life, which would dishonour his character, either as a man or as a husband. He should call a number of witnesses, persons of the highest rank and character in life, and who had the greatest opportunities of being intimately acquainted with Lord and Lady Boringdon, who would prove most unquestionably, that Lord Boringdon had always treated his Lady with the greatest kindness and affection, and that they appeared a very happy couple. He could also produce letters written by Lady Boringdon to her Lord, before there was any question of adultery, and in which her Ladyship shewed all the anxiety and tenderness of a most affectionate wife. The first letter was dated the 14th of April, 1806, and had the following expressions:—

"I am very sorry, my dearest love, to hear that you are not well. I was so anxious about your letter, that I was almost afraid to enquire. I have myself been unwell, and induced to take some laudanum (you must not scold me). This made me so ill, that I could not go to church last Sunday, as I intended. Do not believe that this was from neglect of your orders, or negligence of any sort, it was from the violence of the cold."

This last sentence shewed the care that the Noble Plaintiff had to fix in his Lady those habits of morality and religion, in which she had been brought up. In the same letter there was the following sentence:—"It appears to me six weeks, instead of six days, since you have left me." There was another letter, dated the 1st of April, 1807, which had the following expressions:—

"It was quite an unexpected pleasure for me to hear from you, I am quite well, and so is my dear little Henry. I hope, my dear Boringdon, you will like my going to the play, as nothing could give me pleasure that was not agreeable to you."

He thought, therefore, that there could not be a doubt remaining on the minds of the Jury, that the circumstances of the present case were those of a seduction under every species of aggravation. As to the visits of Sir A. Paget, it was quite impossible that Lord Boringdon should have known any thing about them, unless the servants told him (and servants were in general very slow to communicate that sort of information). The Defendant appeared to be always lurking about the house, to pay his visits as soon as Lord Boringdon had gone out. Independent of these visits, Lady Boringdon used often to visit at the house of a near connection of his Lordship by marriage, where Sir Arthur constantly visited. His Lady also went out often in the carriage with her child and its nurse, which was a circumstance that could not give suspicion to any reasonable husband. The carriage used to stop at the Bayswater Gate of Kensington Gardens, and her Ladyship chose the private walk, where Sir Arthur Paget always met her. The nurse then went one way with the child, and the Defendant and Lady Boringdon went another way, and were absent usually for an hour or more. The fact of the adultery was confessed; and in estimating the damages that ought to be given, he trusted the Jury would refer to that which had ever been held the best criterion in those cases, the rank and situation of the parties. To their good sense, integrity, and justice, he would now commit the cause of his Noble Client, and he trusted that the verdict would be such as reason, justice, morality, and religion demanded of them in such a case.

Lord Amherst, the Hon. Mr. George Villiers, Dr. Vaughan, Sir W. Elford, and the Rev. Mr. Hayne, proved that Lord and Lady Boringdon always appeared to be on the most affectionate terms, and that his Lordship always treated her with the utmost kindness.

Elizabeth Croft was nurse to Lord Boringdon's child. Her Lady often went with her and the child in the carriage to Kensington Gardens. The carriage always stopped at the Bayswater Gate, and when they got into the gardens, they were always met by Sir Arthur Paget. She and the child walked on, and her Lady and Sir Arthur separated from them, and were generally from three quarters of an hour to an hour and a half before they joined them. Her Lady then returned to the carriage with her, and drove home. On her cross-examination by Mr. Garrow, she said, that the Lady and the Defendant walked in the gardens at those times, but that she never knew them go out of them to any house.

Sarah Porter was Lady Boringdon's maid for near five years. She had never seen the Defendant and her Lady together at the house in town, but she knew that he visited frequently in the absence of his Lordship, and had seen him more than once come out of the house.

William Radnor was porter to Lord Boringdon for the last five years. He frequently opened the door to Sir Arthur Paget, who generally bolted up stairs (as the witness expressed himself) without asking whether Lady Boringdon was at home or not. He sometimes enquired for her. Their visits were always paid when his Lordship was out, and the Defendant generally staid there for an hour or two at a time.

Mr. Garrow said, in defending his client, it was his duty to call the attention of the Jury to the case as it had been made out in evidence. Sir Arthur Paget was a brave soldier, the second son of a noble family, and had served his Sovereign in the honourable situation of Ambassador; but although these considerations might raise him to an equality with the Plaintiff in point of rank, it certainly gave him no equality in point of fortune. Every body knew that Sir A. Paget was by no means a man of fortune, and that whatever his connection with a Noble family might give him at a future day, that would depend upon his father's pleasure. He remembered in a case of this sort, a Noble Friend of his (Lord Erskine) in speaking of the fortune of the Defendant, said, "You may ask any man you meet in "Bond-street what is his fortune, and they will tell you, he "has none, and every body knows it;" the same observation would apply to Sir Arthur Paget. If there had been any friendship or hospitality violated, the Plaintiff's agents would have brought forward witnesses to prove it. At Kensington-gardens nothing was proved, but the Defendant's walking with her, and that they did not think it necessary to have the nurse of the party. There was nothing like proof of any criminality till the time of elopement; and by the testimony of the witnesses it appeared that she and the Plaintiff had lived in a state of harmony and affection up to that time. He considered that the real cause of these things in fashionable life proceeded in a great measure from the course of education which young ladies of rank receive, and from the manner they are introduced into life. A young lady, who was known to be an heiress, after a certain course of education, which was well known, came out, or, as the polite phrase is, was introduced into the world at about 15 or 16 years of age. She soon met somebody that her parents considered a good match in point of rank, and after a short courtship they were married. After marriage, fashion (which he feared was often the bitterest enemy of our happiness), made them see but little of each other. Fashion might drive a Nobleman to attend his Parliamentary duty, and might drive his Lady to some other mode of passing her time. She meets an agreeable saunterer, and is pleased with his conversation: she receives his first visit, and is pleased with the repetition of them. Fashion had made separate beds necessary among married people in high life, and it made the pursuits of the husband and wife different. It might, perhaps, be fashion which suggested to Lord Boringdon to question his wife about the visits of Sir A. Paget; but whether he questioned her mildly or otherwise, there could be no doubt but that was the immediate cause which induced her to elope, and throw herself under the protection of Sir A. Paget, on whose account she had incurred the suspicions of her husband, and been ruined in his good opinion—how was it possible for Sir Arthur to refuse that protection? There was not a shadow of proof of criminality before the elopement. There was no officious chambermaid to tell of doors being fastened, or of her Lady's dress being discomposed. It appeared that the elopement was entirely the effect of Lord Boringdon's questioning her, and that when she conceived herself ruined in his opinion, she resolved to throw herself upon the protection of Sir Arthur, who could not, in honour or in spirit, refuse to receive her.

The Sub-Sheriff recapitulated the evidence to the Jury, and made some appropriate observations on the hearing of it.

The Jury, after a short consideration, found for the Plaintiff Damages, Ten Thousand Pounds.

Another Crim. Con. cause is pending, in which a Gentleman of extensive property is Plaintiff, and a youth, under 18 years, who officiated as footman in the family, and is now a waiter at an Hotel in St. James's-street, is Defendant. The scene of adultery is said to have been at a village near Canterbury.

Hanson.—Twelve were sentenced to be transported for seven years; and minor sentences were passed on a number of others.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

DEAL, JULY 22.—The Expedition from Ramsgate, consisting of the 9th, 43d, 52d, and 97th Regiments made an attempt to sail this morning, the wind having backed round to S. E. but were prevented by a sudden change to the S. W. and still remain in the Downs in perfect readiness, only waiting the opportunity of the wind coming fair. General Dumourier, it is confidently asserted, is to accompany this Expedition in the St. Albans, which is appointed to convey it to their destination. The Staff will join at Spithead.

A Letter, of which the following is a copy, was posted on Friday at Lloyd's:—

"Alicant, June 12, 1808.

"TO MR. JOHN CHUTER, LONDON.

"SIR—Inclosed you have a letter from Capt. Charles Bradford, of the ship Ann, of Alexandria. He will advise you, that the Consul of the United States (our Senior) has succeeded in obtaining an order both from the French and Spanish Governments of this country, to liberate all the American vessels detained by either, in virtue of the Decree of Milan of 17th Dec. 1807. And accordingly Capt. Bradford sailed for Villeneuve, to take in his cargo for your place. He carries a copy of his protest, and every other paper, in order that you may settle with the under-writers for the damages on his detention, &c.

(Signed) Ro. MONTGOMERY and Co.

CORONER'S INQUEST.—On Thursday evening at five o'clock, a Coroner's Inquest was held by Joseph Shelton, Esq. to inquire into the circumstances of the death of Mr. Edward Jones, a very old gentleman, who was a clerk in the Receiver-General's Office, in the Custom-house. It appeared in evidence, that Mr. Jones, was above 70 years of age, and had been 50 years of that time employed in the Custom-house. For some time past, Mr. Jones, on various occasions, exhibited signs of levity and eccentricity, which were considered by his friends as the certain symptoms of a deranged intellect. He appeared, at various times, quite incoherent and distrait in his manners and conversation, and used frequently to jump up and dance upon the desk in his office. On Wednesday morning he retired to a water-closet, near his office, and shortly afterwards the report of a pistol was heard by several persons, without any suspicion of the right cause. the deceased was found with his face quite blown off, without leaving the vestige of a human feature; the lower jaw torn away, and, in the right hand of the deceased, the butt end of the pistol was firmly grasped, but the barrel burst: and it was very naturally concluded from these appearances, that the deceased, in order the more effectually to secure his desperate purpose, had over-charged the pistol, and fired into his mouth, when it burst, and produced the horrid effects just described. In his pockets were found two razors, and a number of pistol bullets. The Coroner's Jury, after some short deliberation, pronounced a verdict of—Lunacy.

DIED.

At Brighton, the Countess of Bath. Her Ladyship has left no will as yet found, except one dated in 1797: should no will of a later date be found, Sir John Louther Johnstone comes into the whole of the landed property (purchased by his uncle the late Sir William Pulteney) as heir at law, and supposed not to be less than 12,000*l.* a year, besides great Parliamentary interest. Sir James Pulteney, husband to the late Countess of Bath, in every case comes into the personal property, computed at least to be 400,000*l.* money in the funds. Sir John L. Johnstone is the only legitimate son of George Johnstone, commonly called Gov. Johnstone, who married a foreign Lady, now married again to Admiral Nugent. The remains of the Countess of Bath were interred yesterday in Westminster Abbey. The procession was magnificently grand and awful, and it consisted of a chain of carriages of the greater part of the nobility in London

On Monday, at Sudbury, Sir John Legard, Bart. of Ganton, Yorkshire, aged 59.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER THIRTY-ONE.

SPAIN AND HER COLONIES.

Spain still continues to fix exclusively the public attention. The exertions of her patriotic inhabitants are read and listened to with avidity. This strong interest has spread through all the gradations of society; and its effects are as visible in the discourse of the mechanic, as in the discussions of the learned. This universal sympathy in the affairs of a nation, which, only a few weeks ago, excited as general a degree of contempt, blended with pity, on account of the despicable servility and moral dotage of her Government, impresses on the mind of the observer the awful consideration of their decisive importance. No motive, inferior to universal liberty or subjection, could effect so quick a transition in the sentiments of the public. They appear to feel strongly that the success or miscarriage of their exertions will decide, whether the States of the Continent are to enjoy the blessings of freedom, local institutions and emulation, which was productive of some disadvantages, and of inestimable advantages: or become the exclusive patrimony of an individual; who, in order to acquire and secure it, is compelled to pull down all the fences, which experience and virtue have planted against the inroads of cupidity and self-love. Such are the awful reflections which force themselves on the political inquirer, as often as he makes Spanish affairs the subject of his disquisitions. Impressed by the magnitude of the subject, he wishes to disembarrass himself of impressions, as far as they are local and individual, in order to bring coolness, impartiality, and judgment to the comprehensive investigation. But the heart is too warmly interested, not to communicate its warmth to the head; and he declaims, when he should reason.

But if the danger of that country be great, the resources are equal, if not superior, to it. If traditionary accounts and the annals of nations furnish too many examples of vice triumphant over virtue; they afford us at the same time the encouraging lesson, that every community, animated with a strong sense of resistance to the encroachments of a foreign tyrant, has been almost invariably successful. Nations, like individuals, when exposed to ordinary dangers, never display a tenth part of their vigour. It is when the peril becomes excessive, when it is aggravated by flagrant injuries, that those extraordinary energies are developed, which confound calculation, and insure success when it is most improbable. Such is the situation of Spain. Had the lawless insatiable ruffian, who founds his greatness on the misery of so many millions, acted with less refinement of villainy, her fate had been already decided; and she would have been hurried, with very little resistance, into the vortex of his ambition. But she is not abandoned to her own resources and exertions. A people, and we are proud to say it, who have the will and the means to assist her effectually, have declared their intention of throwing their entire weight into the scale of her destinies. A people, whose moral sense, civil institutions, and national resources, give them a preponderance more than sufficient to incline the balance.

The measures adopted for their assistance are as comprehensive as they are judicious. The choice, the promptitude, the execution, are equal to the exigency, and afford an honourable testimony of the capacity of the men to whom they were confided. Nothing has been left to chance. Every thing which wisdom could suggest, or honesty approve, has been adopted. The gauntlet, which the foe had been threatening, for more than fifteen years, to throw on our shores, we have wrenched from his hand, and are ready to fling it on his own coast. Wherever the combat is to be decided, it would be worse than pusillanimity to doubt of its success. We have the justice of our cause, the wishes of mankind, our undivided, national strength, and the approbation of Heaven in our support. There never was a period of our history, in which this country offered so imposing an aspect. Unanimity at home; our army more numerous, and better disciplined than at any former time—our fleets riding, without a rival, on the ocean—The riches of the state and of individuals double what they were thirty years ago—our national character with a strong reputation of probity, and our Government of vigour. Such is our situation.

Let us now turn our attention from Spain to her Colonies. Here we must pause for a moment; and revert to a circumstance, the disastrous effects of which will now be the more sincerely regretted. It has left unfavourable impressions which even our conduct towards the Mother Country will not easily efface. It is unnecessary to mention that we advert to the unfortunate expeditions to Buenos Ayres. Without endeavouring to increase the public contempt or indignation against the projectors or commanders of the ignominious enterprizes, we reprobate, strongly do we reprobate, the callous insensibility of those men who brought this stigma on our arms. In a vast extent of country, where our name was revered, the bravest and most disinterested nation upon earth is branded with the epithet of coward and plunderer. However the justice of his much offended country has pronounced his doom; and we will abandon him to the reproaches of his conscience and the contempt of his former companions. Let us turn away from the painful subject, and fix our attention on the object of our disquisition.

The Transatlantic possessions of Spain present us a considerable field for speculation, both in a commercial and political point of view. Were it possible that we could be biassed only by motives of interest in the assistance we afford the Spaniards, we would find a sufficient compensation for any sacrifices we should make in the advantages we should enjoy from an unprohibited intercourse with their Colonies. In an immense tract of country, where the climate, a defective system of internal administration, and the jealousy of the Mother Country restrained the progress of industry, a free market will be open for our manufactures. Almost every article, from the coarsest rug to the most finished articles of luxury will find there consumption. Whether we shall enjoy the privilege of sending them thither in our own shipping, or through the channel of the Spanish Markets in Europe, it offers a rich source of emulation and riches to our manufacturing towns. This commerce, which was before indirect or illicit, and exposed to numberless difficulties and risks, will be soon the exclusive privilege of our merchants. The consumption of articles of European industry will multiply hereafter to a great extent in that country. The cupidity of the Viceroys, the ignorant policy of the Spanish Government at home, and the severe prohibition of every kind of intercourse with other nations, carried articles, which were the refuse of the European Markets, to an incredible price. But it is to be hoped that the regeneration of the Spanish people and Government, in substituting more enlarged and enlightened regulations for their former impolitic restrictions, will effect a salutary change in this respect.—Every thing cries for reform in their colonies. Every principle of sound policy, as well as of humanity, will suggest the necessity of doing it speedily. This amelioration of their colonial system will not be one of the least of the advantages from their independence. To our efforts they will be principally indebted for them; and there is every reason to believe, that privileges will be granted to our traders, which will not be allowed to those of any other nation. Whatever may be the issue of the present contest, the advantages it will procure us in a commercial point of view are inestimable, and will make up for any losses we may sustain in the European markets.

This is a subject which requires the most serious attention. Spain, though we have no apprehensions of that event at present, may fall a victim to the artifices of her present enemy. The encouragement and assistance we give the Patriots, are a new incitement to us to secure to as many of them as would be willing to retire, in case of misfortune, a retreat in the new world. They will take with them their partiality and gratitude to us, and an unextinguishable hatred against the oppressors of their country. As the best conducted human affairs are not secure from a reverse, we should be prepared for the possibility of such an event. Exclusive of the impressions, which the outrages committed against their sovereign and family, and the circulation of newspapers containing the animated proclamations of the Patriots will produce in America, we should immediately set about effacing every unfavourable bias which our late unfortunate enterprize may have occasioned. Perhaps the most effectual mode of doing this, would be to obtain permission from the constituted authorities in Spain to send out men of ability, of a conciliating disposition, and perfectly acquainted with the language, in the character of commercial agents. There is no reason to believe that the Patriots will object to it, as they are in a manner more interested in it than we are ourselves. These precautions, with the benefits resulting to the colonists from a free trade with us, would soon remove their present alienation, and prepare them for a determined resistance to French usurpation. They have retained all the partialities and prejudices of Spaniards. They have carried out with them, and preserved their national antipathy against the French. No length of sojourn effaces this deeply rooted bias. Though the viceroys and governors, to please the ministry at home, and particularly the Prince of Peace, who was the great source of favour and nomination, have adopted the tone of the time in their proclamations, we do not apprehend much from these effusions of zeal and rancour against us. They will change these sentiments, as soon as they are acquainted with the occurrences in their country; and if they do not do it from patriotism, they will from interest. We are not inclined to believe they will act in opposition to the tide of popular sentiment, from gratitude to an exiled favorite.

They are Spaniards, and are animated with Spanish sentiments. They have nothing to apprehend from the monster who has treacherously abused their sovereign; and when interest, patriotism, a sense of honour, and national feelings recommend to them to embrace the cause of the Patriots, it is not to be supposed they would have the folly and villainy to prefer the interests of a stranger an usurper to these united motives. Another important reflection, which suggests itself here, is the unbounded influence which the clergy exercise in New Spain. They are still more devoted to the interests of the Holy See, than even men of the same description are in Spain; and when they hear of the outrage committed against the head of their church, they will soon counteract the possible treachery of the Viceroys. Whatever be the issue, the people of this country have the satisfaction of having done their duty; and after a long lapse of time when every trace of the crimes of our age will be effaced but the memory and the abhorrence; when the name of Bonaparte will only serve to employ the pen of a future Tacitus or of a Guicciardini, or afford awful matter, like that of Richard the Third, to another Shakespeare, then will no transaction in our history receive more praise and approbation.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XXVIII.

" As to any hope of the French being resisted without a total " change of the Government, and even a very considerable shift- " ing of property, it is downright folly to entertain it. Al" ready is there a scheme for selling part, at least, of the pro- " perty of the Church. If this be the case before the contest is " well begun, what must take place before it be ended."—
Cobbett's Weekly Political Register, July 23, 1808.

Is not this a glorious prospect, Mr. Cobbett? But, with oracular conciseness, the agitated prophet is not explicit enough, and leaves his hearers struck with horror and dismay at the convulsions which his prophetic enthusiasm throws him into. As he was sitting on the sacred tripod, he might have added:—
" What do I behold!—Oh glorious day!—Oh thrice happy
" people!—Altars overturned—Churches converted into theo" philanthropical temples—Pulpits into popular tribunes...
" The existence of a God proclaimed—Sovereignty of the Mob " —Revolutionary Tribunals—Committees of Public and Gene" ral Safety—Humane executions with grape shot.—The lands
" and goods of the Grandees will very soon be applied to an excellent
" purpose. They have fed long enough upon the labour of others;
" and now the turn of those others is come."—And, smash, goes
" Kingly power; and, then, the prophet jumps from his tripod."
But this happy time is not yet arrived. The prophet, in his jansenistical convulsions, must not forget that the people of this country do not give implicit credit to the miracles of Paris, and are not ripe for these innovations in Religion, Government, and Property. They may have the obduracy to mistake the prophet for the deceiver; and you know, Sir, what consequences have occurred from such misconceptions. It is well for you, that your attachment to the Constitution of your Country secures you from any such suspicion; and, I am very much mistaken in your character, if you possess so much political sanctity, as to expose yourself to the risk of martyrdom. Whatever contempt you may secretly entertain for the understandings of Englishmen, you must be cautious in shewing it too often; for they are a very sturdy people, when their good nature is grossly abused; and though they may not pelt a Political Declaimer with rotten eggs, to borrow your own popular, emphatic style, they may take him for a noisy, impudent, declaiming mountebank, refuse to purchase his infallible remedies, and smash goes his profits, his villa, and his noble friends. I appeal to you, if the pleasure of witnessing from his eminence the surprise and roaring laughter of the spectators, be a compensation for the considerable advantages he enjoys, and may continue to enjoy, if he knows how to restrain himself within the bounds of loyalty and prudence. You, certainly, will not have the careless levity of men of that description, who, if they are unsuccessful in one fair, console themselves with the profits they expect in another. Remember you have been once disappointed. I conclude so from the acrimony with which you speak against the Americans.—But don't laugh at my simplicity—I am convinced you have been very well received in that country.—I absolutely forgot to whom I was speaking—I was weak enough to place your comprehensive mind on a level with ordinary understandings, and to think it would be biassed by the paltry considerations of benefits and kindness.

Sic parvis componere magna solebam.

But the recollection of your conduct in this country soon rectified the mistake; and the better you have been received in Amer-rica the more your enlarged unbiassed manner of speaking of the institutions and people of that country, excites the astonishment and admiration of your cotemporaries. An uncommon manner of thinking and feeling is the exclusive privilege of men of your genius.

But, apropos, you have been rather injudicious in your compositions of late; and though you do not attach much importance to classical taste, you should not entirely neglect the rules laid down by the critics. If your wild, uncultivated genius, more particularly qualifies you for that species of writing called fiction, you must be cautious to maintain some appearance of probability. Had you consulted Horace, Boileau, or Pope, they would inform you that probability is a necessary ingredient in the style of writing you most excel in. Oh that is quite a different case, if you imagine that the memory of Englishmen is as confined as their good nature is extensive. There is no other way of accounting for your description of the arbitrary measures of the present administration. Where was your discretion when you could be so indifferent to the feelings and understandings of your readers. Even Ariosto himself never loses sight of the probable. As every one of your readers receives weekly proofs of your poetic licence, how could you be guilty of so gross a blunder as to assert that the present Ministers are severe censors. You must know there is a number of men in this country who are disinterestedly attached to the Constitution, who blame those censors, not for their severity, but on account of their lenity towards writers of your description; and till you can disembarrass yourself of those troublesome fellows, you must restrain your sublime imagination. You may sneer and laugh as much as you please, among your friends, at the extravagant notions of these modern Catos: but till you can succeed in making them as suspicious and odious to the people of England, as your brother Tribunes did the same class of men at Rome, you will find some difficulty in making the public relish the sublime licentiousness of your style. Those patriots are most intractable personages; they are fraught with prejudices in favour of the present Government, and are attached, with the most incorrigible stubbornness, to our establishments in church and state; and as there are many of them as zealous as Nasica himself, you ought to be more circumspect in the satisfaction you express at the prospect of seeing a revolutionary government established in Spain, and of a confiscation of the property of the clergy and nobility.

However, I am inclined to pardon your neglect of probability, in consequence of the good humour you display at the idea of the Spanish ladies getting in the harvest. From the pleasure with which you mention this circumstance it may be surmised you forgot you were writing from Botley, and had some hopes of assisting those amiable shepherdesses in their rural labours. Ah! le doux berger que Mons. Cobbett! But take care, the Spaniards are not so gallant as your friends in a neighbouring country. They have already given stronger proofs than you may relish, of their dissatisfaction with impertinent strangers interfering with their government, property, church lands, and ladies: and though I entertain not the least doubt of your gallantry, and of the dangers you would expose yourself in the service of the fair, I would advise you to remain at Botley, as I cannot rely on your discretion.

Well, Mr. Cobbett, your greatest enemies must acknowledge that you have a most powerful imagination. How much will they have admired your bold figure of the "sweeping scythe," and its mowing down of pimps, bawds, parasites, buffoons, toad-eaters in red, blue, and black! What a picture you have drawn there! And though they may have the squeamishness to object to the chasteness of the style, they remain confounded at the boldness of the execution. They may say what they please about the delicacy of the bee in culling sweets and flowers, but, with the revolutionary snout of that useful animal the swine, you explore all the sinks of society to find the figures for your picture. You see, Sir, I begin to make some proficiency in your own style of composition; with the study, and under the guidance of so great a master, it is impossible to be long restrained by the fastidious laws of decorum. And there is reason to expect, that with the other innovations you project, you will at last succeed in revolutionizing the language, and rescuing it from the tyrannic restraints of Pope, Dryden, and such tyrants.

But there is a very considerable weakness I have to object to in your last summary, and which I did not expect from a gentleman of Mr. Cobbett's consummate prudence in such matters. How is it possible your principles could make you so totally blind to your interests. You have been too indiscreet in your satisfaction at the change of property in Spain. Did you reflect that the promulgating of such principles may introduce a taste for similar innovations in this country. Consider you have a very considerable stake yourself. I would not be in the least surprised, if a stronger and more sturdy fellow than you, considering the influence you have over that kind of people, should relish your doctrine, and applying a dagger to your breast, insist on your sharing with him the profits of your Political Register. An indiscretion of this kind I would not expect from you, Mr. Cobbett; for whatever opinion I may entertain of the soundness of your heart, I never thought your head enthusiastic or weak enough to propose any thing detrimental to your interests. You know you may be as sentimental and disinterested as you please with regard to the property of others, but you should be circumspect in bestowing your commendations on a project, which may expose your own to the "fatal and sweeping scythe."

Your animadversions on the late meeting of the Common Council must afford the sincerest pleasure to every honest and enlightened man in this country. They will shew you, Mr. Cobbett, in your real character; and remove every doubt which may be still entertained with regard to the purity of your intentions. That Mr. Quin, you mention, is said to have been one of the most zealous in his professions of attachment to his Sovereign, and consequently was a fit subject for your delicate irony: but, notwithstanding all his zeal and loyalty, you have still the advantage over him, that you are more universally known. Believe me you are, Sir; and if any one should still misunderstand you, I would be more inclined to doubt his integrity than his understanding. Your allusion to Mr. Alderman Birch was so truly attic, that, struck with a prominent feature in your character, I cannot resist an inclination to borrow it. I sincerely congratulate the public, "you man of brass," that the tendency of your writings cannot be mistaken for the future.

But I am absolutely under the necessity of telling you, that your train of new and noble ideas has displeased me. There is too much of the Joseph Surface in it; and if you set any value on the continuance of my correspondence, you will abandon that rant. You may be as extravagant and eccentric as you please, all that makes me laugh. You may even be as indelicate and gross as you please; that affords me satisfaction; for I admire consistency and support of character. But when you affect to be sentimental, you do it clumsily, and I wish to see you adopt a style more congenial to your disposition. Be abusive; be indecent; be any thing; but avoid the dulness of sentimental declamation. Even your train of new and noble ideas displeases me, because the sentiment is absolutely false, (I know you like a little bluntness). Those noble ideas, which you impute to the Spaniards, are not new. The friends of your bosom, of your choice (I absolutely disapprove of your modesty in depriving them of the honour of the discovery) that noble nation you so much admire has long since published them. However I will excuse you this time on account of your "outrageous" passion with the Courier, You treated him as he deserved. He never moves out of the contracted sphere of national feelings, and is eternally tormenting us with the merits of the present ministry. Since I began to read you, I dislike all encomiums on those men, and would, like the Athenian boor, on that very account vote for their Ostracism. Besides this outrageous courier is bringing us the most uncharitable accounts of your transmarine friends. But you, Mr. Cobbett, have reason to thank Heaven that you are not like that Samaritan,—You possess a rich fund of charity; and your charitable pen frequently recommends the noble virtue of not only pardoning, but even loving our enemies. You are a prodigy, Sir, in our degenerate age! and future ages, should they happen to mention you, will wonder that our cotemporaries were so slow in doing justice to your intentions.

CIVIS.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH, DUTCH, AND SWEDISH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, JULY 14.—All the Prussian Officers, prisoners of war in France, have arrived at Nancy from the different depots, where they remain for the present.

On the 7th instant, the Junta at Bayonne held their twelfth meeting. It was the day appointed for the acceptance of the new Constitution. In the chamber where they sat were erected a magnificent throne and a richly decorated altar, the service of which was performed by the Archbishop of Burgos. His Majesty being seated on the throne, delivered the following speech:

"Gentlemen Deputies—I was desirous of presenting myself in the midst of you previous to your separation from each other.

Digitized by Google

Assembled in consequence of one of the extraordinary events to which all nations in their turn, and at particular conjunctures, are subject, and, in pursuance of the dispositions of the Emperor Napoleon, our illustrious brother, ———, your feelings have been those of his age. The result of these sentiments will be consolidated in the Constitutional Act, which will be forthwith read to you. It will preserve Spain from many tedious broils which were easily to be foreseen from the disquietude wherewith the nation has been so long agitated. The turbulence which still prevails in some of the provinces will cease, as soon as the Spaniards shall have been apprised that their religion, the integrity and independence of their country, and their dearest rights are secured; as soon as they shall discover the germs of their prosperity in the new institutions—a blessing which the neighbouring nations have not obtained, but at the expence of bloodshed and calamities of various kinds. Were the Spaniards assembled here in one body, all of them, as having the same interests, would be animated with the same sentiments. Then should we not have to bewail the misfortunes of those, who, misled by foreign intrigues, must be subdued by the force of arms. The enemies of the Continent, by the disturbances which they have excited in our country, expect to become masters of our Colonies. Every honest Spaniard must open his eyes, and all must crowd round the throne. We carry along with us the Act which ascertains the rights and reciprocal duties of the King and his people. If you are disposed to make the same sacrifices with us, then shall Spain be speedily tranquil and happy at home, and just and powerful abroad. To this we solemnly pledge ourselves, in the presence of God, who reads the hearts of men, and rules them according to his good pleasure, and who never forsakes those who love their country and fear nothing but their own consciences."

The Act of Constitution was then read over in a loud voice; and the Members of the Junta, on the question being put, unanimously declared their acceptance of it.

The President delivered a short address in answer to the King's speech, after which the several Members took the following oath:—"I swear obedience and fidelity to the King, the Constitution, and the Laws."

The Junta then attended his Majesty's levee to pay him their respects upon this occasion. His Majesty gave them the most gracious reception, and conversed with them more than an hour.

His Majesty the King of Spain set out from Bayonne at six in the morning of the 9th instant, on his journey to Madrid. His Majesty the Emperor accompanied him for the first post. On the separation of the two Sovereigns, the King took into his carriage M. d'Azanza, Minister of the Indies, and the Duke del Parque, Captain of the Life Guards. His Majesty entered Spain by Irun, and was expected to reach St. Sebastian's at two o'clock on the same day, the 9th, where he was to remain until the following day. His Majesty has near a hundred carriages in his suite.

The Members of the Junta set off in three divisions; the first on the 8th; the second on the 9th; and the third on the 10th; each of which will alternately accompany his Majesty on his journey.

We learn from Italy, that by a decree of the Viceroy, the cities of Ancona and Senegaglio are to enjoy all the rights which formerly belonged to them as free ports.

FRENCH OFFICIAL BULLETIN.

MADRID, JUNE 15.—The following intelligence is published by our Government:—

"General Dupont, who commands a corps of the French army, while passing through Andujar on the 24th May, received information that the enemy of Spain and of France had succeeded in misleading a part of the inhabitants of Lower Andalusia. The disaffected had taken up arms, and had not only formed a union with the Contrabandistas (the Smugglers), but had thrown open the prisons and armed the felons. General Dupont had directed his march in the manner in which it is proper to proceed in a friendly country, in order that the inhabitants of those places through which he had to pass might not be too heavily burthened; but in consequence of the information which his Excellency had obtained, he determined to halt, and to concentrate his columns.

"On the 7th of June, the French troops arrived at the Bridge of Alcolea, seized two pieces of artillery which defended it, drove the enemy to the Laucha, and there took the rest of the artillery.—The pursuit of the rebels lasted until half past eleven, and was continued to the gates of Cordova.

"At three in the morning the French troops made their entrance into that town, which had been retarded by the revolt only about two hours and a half.

"Twelve thousand men, who refused to acknowledge the lawful authority, had assembled at Tudela, and had broken down the bridge. General Lefebvre marched on the 9th towards that point, with a corps of French troops. They passed the Ebro on rafts, with charged bayonets, took possession of the artillery, drove back the rebels from point to point, and completely dispersed them.

"The wretches who had committed all kinds of excesses in Valladolid and its neighbourhood, directed their march, 5000 in number, towards the Rio Pisuerga, in order to secure the passage. On the 7th, Generals Merle and Lasalle arrived and attacked them. One division began by deploying itself, and four pieces of artillery were brought up, by which the Rebels were quickly put to flight. They left five cannon behind them, besides 2000 muskets, their colours, and all their provisions and ammunition. On the same day the French proceeded on their march towards Valladolid."

GERMANY.

LOWER ELBE, JULY 12.—We have received intelligence from Spain to the 20th ult. inclusive, according to which, on the 9th and 10th, General Laselles had disarmed the city and province of Palencia. On the 11th, at day-break, he broke up for Cabezon, where the rebels, to the number of 12,000 men, with six pieces of cannon, had taken post, under the command of General Cuesta.

Having reconnoitred the position of the rebels, Brigadier-General Subathier made a rapid march over the bridge under the fire of the enemy, while General Merle took the necessary steps to cut off their retreat towards Valladolid. The firing having lasted about half an hour, the insurgents were totally defeated; and, abandoning their artillery, fled in all directions in the greatest disorder, with a loss of 1000 men. The loss of the French is very inconsiderable, consisting only of six killed, and from eight to ten wounded.

The Bishop and the principal Clergy of Valladolid, went out to meet the General, to intercede with him for the inhabitants. The French division entered the place amidst a multitude who deserved severe chastisement. They were extremely surprised at the clemency they experienced, and expressed their conviction that the troops of no other nation would have treated them with such magnanimity.

The disarming of the masse was actively proceeded with.—About 50 of the most culpable of the insurgents were shot.—Some Monks were carried off from each of the cloisters as hostages.

General Lefebvre gave orders to several moveable columns to march towards Tudela, to subdue the inhabitants within a circuit of ten miles, and to bring them back to their allegiance.

The Bishop of Tarvanzona had delivered up 500 muskets.—Several of the Chiefs have made their submission, and exposed the cause of their Monarch.

Subsequent to the action which took place at Tudela on the 8th, General Lefebvre permitted his troops to rest on the 9th, 10th, and 11th. This interval he employed in re-establishing the bridge over the Ebro, and disarming the inhabitants of the environs.

On the 12th, he marched to Alagos. At day-break of the 13th, he discovered on the heights an army of insurgents, who were commanded by Pallafox, the Commander in Chief of Saragossa. General Lefebvre immediately formed his troops in columns, and ordered them to advance. The insurgents were supported by two batteries, of six pieces of artillery each.

General Lefebvre proceeded in person with his cavalry and a company of light troops, to take the insurgents in flank. They made one discharge before he approached them within reach of musket-shot, and fled, leaving behind them their artillery, and throwing away their muskets in the flight. Upwards of 2000 threw themselves into the Ebro, and were drowned. The Polish chasseurs conducted themselves with great bravery. Many of them swam across the Ebro, to cut off a column of the insurgents. Four Polish soldiers were killed, and one Captain drowned. The total loss of the French, on this occasion, consisted in four killed and nine wounded.

After the affair of Alagos, General Lefebvre continued his march. On the 14th, he came up with a considerable body of the rebels of Saragossa, whom he instantly attacked and defeated, with the loss of 300 men and two pieces of cannon.—After gaining this advantage, he continued his march towards the city.

General Dupont in reaching Alcola in Andalusia, on the 7th inst. came in sight of the insurgents who were under the command of Don Pedro Echeverri. He charged across the bridge, attacked the insurgents, and routed them with the loss of all their artillery, consisting of six pieces of cannon.

The numbers of the enemy were very great, but they were dispersed like clouds of dust; and at eleven of the same day, General Dupont entered Cordova, so that his march towards that city scarcely experienced a delay of two hours from the insurgents.

The Magistrates and principal inhabitants of Valladolid were exposed to the most dreadful sufferings, while that city remained in the possession of the rebels. They erected a gibbet under the Captain General La Cuesta's windows, in order to compel him by terror to place himself at their head.

Cevallos, on his arrival from Segovia at Valladolid, was put to death by the enraged populace. His head was stuck on a pike, and carried in procession through the city, after which it was tossed about the streets.

The general disarming was carried on without intermission; and all the people in that city were returning to their duty.

After the affair of Alagos, General Lefebvre continued his march; and on the 16th he arrived in front of the gates of Saragossa. He made himself master of the entrenchments which the insurgents had thrown up, on the piece of ground which was formerly covered with olive-trees, carried off the 18 pieces of artillery, by which they were defended, and got possession of the middle-gate.

The greatest anarchy prevailed in the city. On the 17th and 18th the various negociations took place with the insurgents. General Lefebvre intended to remain for some time in the position which he had taken, in order to prevent the well-affected inhabitants from being exposed to the horrors of an assault; and it was supposed that his expectations of the happy result of this measure would not be disappointed.

Marshal Moncey left Cuenza on the 16th, and was directing his march towards Reguera. General Lefebvre was marching towards Alvacette, in the kingdom of Murcia. General Wredel was advancing into the kingdom of Grenada.

The Prince of Castal Franco, the Councillor of Castille, Don Ignaz Martinez de Villela, and the Alcaide Don Louis Marcellin Pereijra, had returned from their journey into Aragon. They made a report to his Majesty on the subject of their mission, assuring him that the orderly classes of the inhabitants had conducted themselves in the most satisfactory manner; but that it was impossible to open a correspondence with the insurgents, as they had returned no answer to any of their letters. General Lefebvre also had a conference with him on the 20th. The Emperor gave orders that every effort should be made to open the eyes of the insurgents, before the city of Saragossa should be exposed to all the horrors of an assault, which would inevitably be attended with the destruction of a great number of well-disposed people.

Marshal Bessieres had tried every means which clemency could suggest to bring the mountaineers to a sense of their duty, but they had sent him no answer. The Archbishop of Burgos had also written to them, and addressed them in a canonical letter, but these applications having been equally unavailing, the Marshal found himself compelled to forcible means.

General Ducos marched against the Escudo, and General Merle to attack the narrow passes in the mountains of Reijnora. —The insurgents were routed before they could make more than one discharge, leaving on the field four 18 pounders, and several hundreds killed.

On the 21st, the corps under both these Generals, which had formed a junction, approached St. Andero. The city made proposals of surrender, in order to prevent an assault.

FROM THE GOTTENBURGH MAIL,

RECEIVED LAST NIGHT.

GOTTENBURGH, JULY 22.—Upwards of 24 Captains of Merchants' ships have arrived here within the last week from Copenhagen; they have been released from prison in consequence of the exchange of prisoners brought about by Admiral Sir J. Saumarez, who sent home in a Cartel all the Danish prisoners from hence that were taken on board the Prince Christian 14-gun ship last winter. These Captains say that the tone of the Danes is much altered towards the English, and praise the good treatment they received. They report, that throughout Holstein the French have taken down from the Post Houses and other places all marks of Danish Royalty, and substituted those of the Emperor Napoleon: This conduct has given great offence to the Danish Government, and with great reason, as Holstein may now be considered as lost to Denmark.

FRANCKFORT ON THE MAINE, JULY 4.—According to the last letters from Rome, his Holiness was on the point of taking his departure for Turin. In all the Austrian dominions a National Guard is to be formed on the same footing as in France. It is also reported that a close alliance is to be concluded between Austria and Russia.

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

EXTRAORDINARY GAZETTE OF SARAGOSSA.

OF THE 30 JULY, 1808.

The day before yesterday, the 1st instant, about midnight, the French army encamped in the environs of this capital, began to bombard the town, and continued the bombardment until the evening of the following day; during which time, upwards of one thousand four hundred bombs, and shells were thrown into the place. The French cavalry and infantry attacked some of the gates; but the heroic valour of the inhabitants and troops of the line succeeded in destroying, by a well directed fire, which was kept up with uncommon briskness, all who came within the range of their guns. The neighbouring fields were strewed with the dead bodies of the French. The Patriots bravely maintained their post, amidst the numberless bombs and shells which struck their batteries.

In the afternoon of the 1st instant, the attack was continued by the French artillery and foot, but they were also routed with a very considerable loss.

On the 2d instant at break of day, the attack was renewed at all points, and after having sustained a severe loss, and convinced themselves of the persevering valour of the defenders of this capital, the French troops retreated, after a fire, which lasted twelve hours, without intermission, and proved extremely destructive to their ranks. The enemy's bombs, shells, and balls, without doing any considerable mischief, merely served to increase the hatred entertained against the enemy, and to remind us of the sacred duties which we owe to our religion, our country, our honour, and our King.

The gallantry displayed by the officers and soldiers, and in particular by the artillerymen, and the officers and troops, who were stationed in the batteries and points attacked, is beyond all praise. A great number of arms have fallen into our hands, and in the possession of the French, slain in the action, many precious articles were found, of which they had robbed the churches and private houses; we have taken a great number of prisoners of war.

In the town of Exea twenty-five of the enemy's cavalry and foot were made prisoners, and brought to this capital.

By an express which left Valentia on the 30th of June, the pleasing intelligence has been officially received, that the French army, commanded by General Moncey, having approached the said capital on the 28th ultimo, the batteries opened upon them, and kept up for seven hours with such unremitting briskness, that the French were defeated with immense slaughter, and the neighbouring fields covered with their dead. The remains of their army retreated in the utmost disorder, exhausted with fatigue, and destitute of provisions, with a vast number of wounded, on the road to Madrid, where the main body of the army of Valencia awaits them to cut off the retreat of the few who remain, and put them to the sword, in return for the acts of violence against this capital.

EXTRACT OF A PRIVATE LETTER FROM ST. SEBASTIAN, OF THE 11TH JULY, 1808.

"Last Saturday, at half past one o'clock in the afternoon, arrived here a person of the name of Joseph, and found a city deserted by nine-tenths of its inhabitants, who fled before his arrival to shun his sight. There was not a single individual who returned the bows he made in his coach, and no shouts were heard but those of a woman in the market-place, who on his passing by, exclaimed,—"Long live Ferdinand VII." —His entry resembled the funeral of a poor deceased in the Hospital. A certain Urquijo complained of this conduct, but no attention was paid to his complaints. The Constituted Authorities received him with the respect which is due to a foreign Prince, and told the Urquijo, that they could not control the sentiments of the people. Joseph, on taking leave, expressed his gratitude to the Constituted Authorities, and found no fault with the want of attention on the part of the people, which he attributed to their attachment to the late dynasty, but declaring at the same time, that he hoped he should deserve and obtain the same attachment, in return for the blessings which he should bestow on his subjects."

FROM THE OVIEDO GAZETTE.

INTELLIGENCE FROM CATALONIA.

OVIEDO, JULY 13.—The little information we possess relative to the state of Catalonia, must render the following news received here very interesting.

Restrained by the Governors, Alcudes Mayor, and Plana Mayor, the Catalonians succeeded in disembarrassing themselves of their impediments, or, in their own words, made a finish of them. In the middle of June there were already at the Molinos del Rey 1500 men from Lerida; 500 from Tortola were soon expected, and as many more Valencians, to lay siege to Barcelona.

The French in Barcelona are greatly in want of powder and provisions. A vessel loaded with powder, and another with pork, have been taken from them. In consequence of this scarcity, the people were in the most critical circumstances, and the French were quite at a loss what to do. If they tried to escape by sea, there was an English squadron; if by land, there was a cordon of troops drawn from Moncado to Mataro. Their attempts against the first of these places, and also that on Montealegre, terminated rather unpleasantly for those heroes, as they fancied they could take them without any trouble; but nothing can deprive them of the glory of having laid waste the whole plain of Barcelona, all the cultivated fields, all the villages, and the churches. They have also burnt down a great number of houses in the towns of Matorell, Pallejo, Molinos del Rey, and other places, all within the district of the city of Barcelona.—Lastly, we are assured that a great firing had been heard between Figueras, Ampurdan, and San Fernando. The Junta at Catalonia have established themselves at Lerida, in order to render the communication with Aragon and Valentia more certain.

DEPOSITION OF THE POPE.

His Majesty the King of Sicily has caused to be published the different Notes that passed between the Secretaries of his Holiness and Mons. Lefebvre, the French Charge d'Affaires, and General Miollis, who in February last took possession of the City of Rome, under the pretext of expelling those whom he denominated "Neapolitan Brigands." The Notes are preceded by a very impartial dissertation on the circumstances whereby France has lately acquired such power and consequence amongst the European States. It arraigns the conduct of Bonaparte with great severity, in overturning the ancient Governments of Europe, enslaving the inhabitants under his minions and dependants. The visible head of the Catholic Church was deprived of his temporal territories, contrary to religion and the law of Nations, under a most imprudent pretext, that the occupation of the Ecclesiastical States by French troops was rendered necessary, because "it was a measure of security for the tranquillity of Italy," a phrase entirely void of meaning; but in the spirit of those reasons, which the French Revolutionists urged for the infamous aggressions they committed against every legitimate Sovereign.

The 1st Note is dated from the Palais Quirinal, from Cardinal Pamfili to M. Lefebvre, and is dated the 2d of March. It complains in the most glowing language of the French Commandant, in forcibly depriving the Chevalier Altieri of the government of Rome; of placing a guard at the Post-office, and opening all the letters, in defiance of the public law; of forcibly incorporating the Papal troops with those of France, and placing guards on all the printing-houses, and thereby depriving his Holiness of the Liberty of the Press.

The 2d Note is from the same Cardinal to Lefebvre, remonstrating, in the name of his Holiness, against the proceedings of the French Commander in imprisoning and threatening the Officers of his Holiness with banishment, because they were averse to unite with the French against the inclination of their Sovereign.

The 3d Note is written by the Secretary of his Holiness to such Cardinals as were ordered by the French to quit the Papal Dominions. Their names are Cardinal Guiseppe, Doria Pamfili, and the Pope's Minister, who was replaced by Cardinal Gabrielli.

The 4th Note is from Cardinal Gabrielli to Lefebvre, complaining of the behaviour of the French in imprisoning and banishing of other Cardinals, natives of Italy, as well as of Naples.

The 5th Note requires the Treasurer of his Holiness to give two Cardinals banished to the North of Italy 1000 Ecus each.

The 6th Note is from Cardinal Gabrielli to Lefebvre, complaining of the French Officers having seized a number of the Papal troops, and confining them, and requiring their liberation.

The 7th Note is from the same to the same, signifying that after the forced incorporation of the Italian and French troops, his Holiness had caused those of his troops who still remained faithful to him to wear a cockade different from the rest, that the public might not ascribe to him the excesses of the French.

The 8th Note is from M. Champagny, addressed to Cardinal Caprara. It calls upon the Pope to declare war against England, and in the event of his refusing to do so, threatens to overturn the Government, and to establish another, which will make common cause with Italy and Naples against the common enemy.—The Note then concludes with an expression of regret that the Cardinal Caprara's demand for passports compelled his Imperial Majesty to consider Rome in a state of war with France.

PROVINCIALS.

BRIGHTON, JULY 22.—A singular accident occurred here last night. Two sailors, who had landed but a short time before from the Dapper gun-brig, lying-to off the town, in passing up North-street, observed a whisky empty, standing at the door of the Coach and Horses-inn in North-street, a boy having the care of the animal in the shafts. The sailors, both nearly intoxicated, instantly determined on a ride, and presently seated themselves in the vehicle, and called to the boy who held the horse, to take care of himself. Without conceiving it necessary to make use of the reins, the whip was now forcibly applied, and the horse at full speed, dashed off with them. On reaching the top of the street, the horse, in lieu of pursuing the road over the Church-hill, took another that led into a chalk-pit, where, in the end, his progress being impeded, he turned himself about, and returned down North-street with the same degree of speed as he had previously passed up, one sailor continuing furiously to make use of the whip, while the other, with Stentorian lungs, desired all the people he saw to take care of their hulks, lest his vessel, which was sailing after the rate of twenty knots an hour, should run them down. It was at this time about half past nine o'clock, and rather dark, so that the individuals in the street, from the irregular progress of the chaise, being as often on the footpath as on the carriage road, were occasionally in the most imminent danger of being rode over. The sailors, however, passed down North-street, and through Castle-square with safety; but on reaching the Steyne, the horse, instead of turning off by the bye-road to the right, made a desperate leap at the fence, breaking one of the posts and two of the rails, and throwing the sailors with dreadful violence on the ground. One of them was but little hurt, but the other had two of his ribs and his collar-bone broken. The latter was taken, in a senseless state, to the shop of Mr. Newham, surgeon, where restoratives were applied with success, and he was subsequently put into a boat and conveyed to his vessel. The horse, with the chaise in a very shattered state at his heels, put to the rout the fashionable pedestrians on the Steyne, occasioning a scene of confusion there that may be better conceived than expressed. Happily no one, the sailor excepted, was hurt; and the horse, without having sustained any material damage whatever, was ultimately stopped in the inner inclosure of the North part of the walk.

THE HOT WEATHER.—In a garden in Ipswich, on Tuesday night, at a quarter past two P. M. the thermometer was 90 degrees. On Wednesday, at the same hour, 93; and on Thursday, at one P. M. 99; at five P. M. the same day, it had sunk to 93; and at eight P. M. only to 80. On Friday, at five A. M. it was 65. with sky cloudy, threatening a sudden change. On a registering thermometer, near the Quay, it stood on Thursday at 97. On another, placed in the steeple at St. Peter's Church, the column of air there was 91, and in a garden near it 92. In the marshes, contiguous to the town, it was only 87, which might be referred to a freer access of air, to evaporation from the river, or to the different hour in which the experiment was made. The heat, at one P. M. on Thursday, was perhaps the greatest summer heat ever noticed in the Eastern part of our island. Boerhaave concluded, that should the heat of the air ever equal the standard of human heat, which, from the imperfection of the thermometer in his time, he placed at 95, instead of 98, the true standard, that man could not remain in existence. But this great philosopher, in this, was mistaken: for in the observations above, it was exceeded by a degree. In the East Indies it is frequently at 108 within doors; yet man not only lives, but lives in health. This happy accommodation of his system of circumstances is brought about by the simple law of evaporation; for as the heat accumulates, it is carried off by a more copious perspiration, and the standard is preserved at the same point. Transport him again to the icy mountains of Greenland, and he will also live in health; for perspiration, now diminished in proportion to the cold around, suffers his heat to accumulate to its usual standard, at which it keeps it; as copious perspiration had before done in the torrid regions of the East.

FOX CHACE EXTRAORDINARY.—The following Fox Chace, which took place about seven weeks ago, in the counties of Inverness and Perth has perhaps, never been equalled in the annals of fox hunting. On the 8th ult. near Dunkeld, Perthshire, there were seen on the high road a fox and a hound proceeding at a slow trotting pace. The dog was about the distance of fifty yards behind the fox: each was so fatigued and spent, that the latter could not out-ran the former, nor the former overtake the latter. A countryman, who observed them in this state, very easily caught the fox by running. Both the fox and the dog were taken to a gentleman's house in the neighbourhood, where the dog received every mark of hospitality to which his unceasing pursuit entitled him, and Reynard was placed in a garden as a prisoner of war; but whether from over-fatigue, or from a determination not to out-live the loss of his liberty, he refused to take any sustenance, and the consequence was, that he died the day following. After the lapse of a week, the dog seemed quite recovered from the fatigues of the chace, on which it was determined by the gentleman whose kindness he so much experienced, to tie a letter to his neck and let him go, in which all the circumstances that passed in that place were stated, it concluded with requesting the owner of the dog, if ever he found his way home, to acquaint Mr. S——t, by post, where the fox was started, in order that the length of the chace, and the time employed in it might be ascertained. In ten days after Mr. S——t received a letter acquainting him, that the dog had arrived safe at his master's house in Badenoch; that he was one of the hounds of the Duke of Gordon's Fox-hunter in that country; and that the fox was started in the morning of the King's birth day, on the top of those hills, called the Mona-liadh, which separate Badenoch from Fort Augustus. From hence it appears, that the chace lasted four days, and that the distance travelled from the place where the game was sprung, to the place where it was caught, without making any allowances for doubles, crosses, and tergiversations, exceeded seventy miles.

At the Assizes at Winchester, on Thursday, Mr. Goldring, a farmer, had a verdict against him for 200*l.* for seducing a Miss Phillips, a farmer's daughter.
